SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 30, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Kent and Washingtonville, in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Canton, Ohio, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of public improvement, and especially the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of the city council of Lake City, Minn., praying that an appropriation be made for the completion of the harbor of refuge at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have had transmitted to me, with a request to present it to the Senate, a memorial prepared by a committee appointed by the convention of postmasters held in Chicago February 15 and 16, setting forth the grievances of postmasters of the third and fourth classes. I present the memorial, and inasmuch as this is a subject which undoubtedly will be urged on the attention of Congress with some force and as of very considerable merit, I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the memorial is already printed in the RECORD of to-day in the proceedings of the House of Representatives of yesterday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It was desired to have it in the RECORD. It is news to me that it is already in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, without the order as to printing.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to say that the memorialists desired also to have it in the proceedings of the Senate in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have an order made that it be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will not urge it if it has already appeared there. Has the memorial been referred?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present a memorial of Local Assembly No. 1474 of Knights of Labor, of What Cheer, Iowa, in opposition to the repeal of the mechanics' lien law of the District of Columbia. Although it is addressed to me personally, it is undoubtedly intended for the consideration of the Senate. I ask that it be received, and move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Boone, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Bridgeport, Derby, and Colchester, in the State of Connecticut, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Weir, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON presented the petition of Messrs. Combz & Gray, of Memphis, Indiana, praying for an extension of their patent on hominy-mills; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Wabash, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Sarah E. Thompson, widow of William M. Thompson, late private of Company H, Eightieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of E. S. Nixon & Son and other florists of Chattanooga, Tenn., praying for a reduction of postage on seeds, plants, bulbs, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CAMERON. I present a number of petitions sent to my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL], who is absent on account of sickness. I move that they lie on the table.

The following petitions, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction, were ordered to lie on the table:

Petition of 8 clergymen, 6 physicians, 7 teachers, 82 business men, and 60 officers of temperance and other societies of Bucks County, Pennsylvania;

Petition of 30 clergymen, 10 physicians, 23 lawyers, 41 teachers, 107 business men, and 35 officers of temperance and other societies of Huntingdon and Franklin Counties, Pennsylvania;

Petition of 20 clergymen, 3 physicians, 4 lawyers, 81 teachers, 84 business men, and 32 officers of temperance and other societies of Erie County, Pennsylvania;

Petition of 15 clergymen, 5 physicians, 1 lawyer, 23 teachers, 78 business men, and 25 officers of temperance and other societies of Crawford and Butler Counties, Pennsylvania;

Petition of 15 clergymen, 21 physicians, 9 lawyers, 33 teachers, 141 business men, and 41 officers of temperance and other societies of Jefferson, Forest, Clarion, and Armstrong Counties, Pennsylvania;

Petition of 26 clergymen, 13 physicians, 17 lawyers, 41 teachers, 137 business men, and 17 officers of temperance and other societies of Beaver County, Pennsylvania; and Petition of 1,297 citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Mauch Chunk, Pa., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Chester County, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry as to the liquor traffic in the several States and Territories; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a petition of citizens and ex-soldiers of Monticello, Ind., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 927, increasing the pension of soldiers who lost a limb in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Jacob Y. Goode, late a private in Company E, One hundred and first Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and other citizens of Jay County, Indiana, praying that the said Jacob Y. Goode may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Frankfort, Goshen, Oakland, Wabash, Boone, Carbon, South Bend, and Michigan City, in the State of Indiana, and a petition of Knights of Labor of Clay County, Indiana, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Moore's Hill, Ind., praying for woman suffrage; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers, citizens of Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill granting a service pension to soldiers of the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Monmouth, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Black Hawk Assembly, Knights of Labor, Cordova, Ill., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Black Hawk Assembly, Knights of Labor, of Cordova, Ill., praying for the passage of the bill now pending for the creation of a department of labor statistics; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Somerville, Mass., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE presented a resolution of the Knights of Labor of Bath, Me., remonstrating against the passage of what is known as the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOLPH presented a memorial of the Vancouver (Wash.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the repeal of the present import duty on lumber and coal; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War of January 5, 1886, transmitting estimates for school building at barracks at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., submitted a report, accompanied by an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill making an appropriation of $47,000 for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1105) granting the right of way to the Kensington and Tacony Railroad Company through the arsenal grounds at Bridesburg, Philadelphia, Pa., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 275) for the relief of William D. Stewart and others, heirs at law of James Stewart, deceased, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Finance instruct me to report back the bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I move that the amendment be printed, and the bill, with the amendment, recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 379) for the relief of David Cornpropst;

A bill (S. 469) for extension of pension to Mrs. Ann Leddy; and

A bill (S. 423) granting a pension to Elizabeth Daniel.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 983) granting a pension to Michael Daly; and

A bill (S. 1384) granting a pension to Mathias Wondrak.

Mr. SAWYER. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1385) for the relief of John D. Ham, to report it adversely, it being covered by a bill I have just reported for the same person. I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I believe the House bill was reported favorably in that case.

Mr. SAWYER. No; there were two Senate bills introduced on the same subject, but they were a little different. There was no difference in the amount, but in the description. We reported the one that was properly described favorably and the other adversely.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 19) for the relief of David C. Paullus;

A bill (H. R. 225) granting a pension to Daniel Connolly;

A bill (H. R. 618) granting a pension to James Morgan;

A bill (H. R. 1084) granting a pension to Alice S. Holbrook.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2002) granting a pension to Betsey A. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2003) granting arrears of pension to Mrs. Betsey A. Mower; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 2004) authorizing the transmission of weather reports, storm and flood warnings, and the announcement of the approach of cold waves through the mails free of charge; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2005) granting a pension to Mary J. Nottage; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pension.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2006) for the relief of Nathan Branson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 2007) authorizing the reduction of taxes, interest, costs, and penalties, in certain cases, in the District of Columbia, in which the taxes, interest, &c., amount to more than the assessed value of the property against which the taxes have been levied; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2008) to change the names of certain streets in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to have the memoranda accompanying the bill printed also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2009) granting a pension to David A. Ireland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2010) granting a pension to William Jumper; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2011) for the relief of John H. Haythorn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2012) for the erection of a monument to the late Abraham Lincoln; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 2013) for the relief of Harriet A. Womack, administratrix; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2014) for the relief of the estate of William Moss, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That Catharine M. Pritchard have leave to withdraw the papers in her case from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, it was Ordered, That Hiram Buckingham have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers relating to his claim, no adverse report having been made thereon.

SPOKANE, PEND D'OREILLE, AND CŒUR D'ALENE INDIANS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer a resolution, and ask for its present consideration if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate with as little delay as practicable copies of all correspondence or petitions on file in his Department between the upper and middle bands of the Spokanes, the lower bands of the Pend d'Oreilles, and the Cœur d'Alene Indians, or of any Indian agent or other person in their behalf or representing them, with the authorities of the United States touching the subject-matter of the removal of said Indians or any of them to any specific Indian reservation in Idaho or in Montana or in Washington Territories; and also in regard to the cession or quitclaim by any of said Indians to the United States of any lands alleged to be heretofore owned or claimed or occupied by them, and also any petition or correspondence in regard to any compensation by the United States alleged to be due said Indians for the cession of such portions of their said lands as are or have been deemed by them not needed for their own Indian reservation purposes.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator to say "directed" instead of "requested."

Mr. VOORHEES. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and use the word "directed" instead of "requested."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Indiana changes the word "requested" to the word "directed." That modification will be made if there be no objection. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

KANSAS AND ARKANSAS VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. PLATT. When the Calendar Order of Business 191 was before the Senate some days ago, being the bill (S. 1484) to authorize the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, I made some remarks upon it. I shall desire when the bill is taken up again to submit an amendment to it. Perhaps it is fair that persons interested in the railroad should have notice of the amendment. I therefore ask now that the amendment may be received and printed as an amendment intended to be offered to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut submits an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill named by him, and asks that it be printed and laid on the table. That order will be made if there be no objection.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the morning business is closed and the Calendar is now in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to take up the bill which was under consideration yesterday, being the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

NEBRASKA LAND DISTRICTS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask the consent of the Senator from Illinois and the indulgence of the Senate to take up and put upon its passage the bill (S. 1487) to establish two additional land districts in the State of Nebraska. The bill has the concurrence of the Committee on Public Lands and also of the Interior Department. There will be no opposition to it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the consideration of the bill taken up on motion of the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1487) to establish two additional land districts in the State of Nebraska.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 58) authorizing the printing of a naval report; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 813) for the relief of George S. Storrs, of Texas;

A bill (S. 812) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham;

A bill (H. R. 81) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood; and

A bill (H. R. 1557) for the relief of David W. Jones.

WILLIAM P. RANDALL.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill which has just been returned to the Senate and dispose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield the floor for that pupose?

Mr. LOGAN. If it will not create any discussion I shall do so.

Mr. DAWES. If it does I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy, which had passed the Senate with amendments and is now returned from the House of Representatives on the request of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendments made to that bill in the Senate were made on my suggestion, not recalling at the time that Lieutenant Randall was already an officer in the Navy and on the retired-list. I therefore desire that the amendments may be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the vote by which the bill was passed will be reconsidered, and the vote by which the amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Senate recede from the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendments will be disagreed to. There are three amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are all to the same effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The several amendments made to the bill in the Senate are disagreed to, and the bill stands passed.

Mr. DAWES. Does the bill stand as passed now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill stands passed without amendment.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 58) authorizing the printing of a naval report was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 29th instant, approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 32) for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie D. Clark, of New Orleans;

An act (S. 178) for the relief of Ida A. Richardson, Caroline A. Urquhart, and Cora A. Slocomb, as the heirs at law of Cora A. Slocomb, deceased, and Ida A. Richardson, and Caroline Augusta Urquhart;

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The military bill will now be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, the pending question being on Mr. HALE'S motion to strike out section 2 of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, in continuation of what I was saying yesterday when the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, I desire to call attention to one or two statements made yesterday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and to call his attention also to the fact that he stated that the request for an increase of this number of men had not been made by any Executive Department or any general of the Army or by any one except the Military Committee of the Senate. I believe that was the language, substantially so at least. I have not looked over the Senator's speech in the RECORD, but I made a memorandum of the remark at the time.

In order to settle that question, and that Senators may speak advisedly when they discuss this matter, I will call the Senator's attention to the report of the Secretary of War, Mr. Endicott. On page 7 of his report he says:

> The Lieutenant-General commends to careful consideration the policy of concentrating troops and putting large garrisons in the vicinity of large cities as a measure of economy—

Not for the purpose that Senators would intimate as the purpose for which troops were to be brought into large cities, but "as a measure of economy." The Secretary of War continues—> the present railroad facilities being ample to transport them to the frontier speedily when needed; and also again recommends the addition of two companies and two majors to each regiment of infantry, and thus make the three arms of the service uniform. In both these recommendations I concur. The reasons for the last are given in the report of the Secretary of War for 1883, as follows.

Now, the Secretary of War says he concurs in the recommendation of the Lieutenant-General of the Army that two new companies be added to each regiment. If that is not a recommendation for the increase of the Army I can not understand the English language. Following on, the Secretary of War says:

> General Sherman calls attention to and renews a former recommendation that a new organization be adopted for the regiments of infantry, so that each shall be composed of twelve companies, making three battalions, of four companies each, each company having one hundred men; and that in time of peace two of these battalions shall be maintained on a perfect war footing, while the other battalion may be a mere skeleton, with its complement of officers, and be used as a nucleus for recruits. The great advantage of this change, as suggested by the General, is the important one of being able to put a large and effective force in the field upon short notice by merely enlisting a sufficient number of additional private soldiers, the officers and organization being always ready to receive them.

With two companies added to each regiment of infantry, there being twenty-five regiments of infantry, and each company to have one hundred men, it seems to me that would make five thousand men. There is the recommendation of the General of the Army, who is retired, the recommendation of the present General of the Army, and the recommendation of the present Secretary of War as well as former Secretaries of War.

Now, I desire to call the attention of Senators, if I can have their attention, to some of the gross errors that Senators fell into yesterday in their statements made in reference to the cost of the Army. It was stated by Senators who ought to know, not intentionally of course, that each regiment cost a million dollars per annum.

Mr. MANDERSON. A thousand dollars per man per annum.

Mr. LOGAN. A thousand dollars per man, being $1,000,000 per regiment, that sum being applied solely to the expenses of the regiment. In fact the Senator from Kansas left the impression on the minds of every one—certainly that would be the impression on the minds of the people of the country, who would not examine this question very carefully, probably, that that was the pay of the regiment; that is to say, that a regiment in their pay, clothing, and rations would cost a thousand dollars per man.

Now, I ask Senators to take their pencils and figure for a moment and see how absurd such a statement as that is. A private soldier receives $13 per month in pay. Count that pay and see how much it is. He receives a ration per day. A ration costs 20 cents. Count that up. He receives clothing valued at $3 per month, making $36 per annum. That is the pay of a soldier. How much does it amount to altogether? Two hundred and sixty-five dollars per annum. Yet we were told yesterday that five thousand men would cost this Government $5,000,000, and the Senator from Kansas said at one time that five thousand men would cost $7,000,000. We will make the cost $265 per annum for a soldier. Count that up so as to be sure. For the five thousand men then the cost would be pay to the soldier, counting that at $16 per month, as it would be under this bill——

Mr. PLUMB. Besides that, the pay is increased by length of service.

Mr. LOGAN. That is a different proposition. I am speaking of the soldier as enlisted. Of course, after serving for a certain length of time his pay is increased a dollar, but the enlistment and cost per annum of these men would, at $16 per month, make $1,500,000. As I said yesterday, it is very easy for a person to make this mistake if he does not look into the items carefully.

Now, let me give to the Senate the items of cost in reference to the Army. Pay of officers and enlisted men, $12,205,000. That is the pay of the officers and enlisted men composing the forty regiments of cavalry, artillery, and infantry and the engineer battalion. Rations of enlisted men, $1,800,000. Clothing of enlisted men, $1,250,000. Making the expense of the Army for pay, rations, and clothing $15,255,000.

Where does the balance of the $25,000,000 that the Army costs go? It is for transportation, which item is necessary anyhow; it is for work on barracks; it is for the military establishment at West Point; it is for the expense of the War Department and War Office. So whether these five thousand men are enlisted in the Army or not, the expense of the Military Academy will go on; the expense of the War Department will go on; transportation will go on; improving barracks will go on; building posts and forts will go on; so that it cuts no figure whatever so far as the extra expense is concerned that is worth reckoning.

I have been in the habit of treating, and wish at all times to treat, all measures with fairness. I care not from what committee or from whom they come. Fairness is a jewel in all things. To undertake to defeat a bill by misstatement, by misrepresentation, by false figuring, and everything of that character is certainly not a fair mode of treating a bill before the Senate or any deliberative body.

How is it possible for any man conversant with the expenditures of the Government to make the cost of five thousand private soldiers to be $5,000,000? I can not understand it. Yet that is the statement made here, and reiterated over and over again.

Let me go a little further with this, sir. Let me call the attention of the Senate for a moment to a few items charged up against the five thousand men the bill proposes to have enlisted for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Army. The expense of the commanding general's office, contingent expenses of the Adjutant-General's Department, barracks, and quarters, transportation, transportation of Army supplies, &c., medical and hospital department. Will any Senator say that this five thousand increase will proportionately increase the expense of the War Department, of the West Point Military Academy, of the medical department, or any of the departments of the War Office?

I had a letter from General Sheridan read yesterday morning; but, inasmuch as it was read in the morning and not commented upon by the Senators who addressed the Senate in opposition to the passage of the bill, I desire to call again the attention of the Senate to the fact that he recommends the enlisted strength of the Army be increased to thirty thousand men. He says:

> I have the honor to direct your attention to a paragraph in my last annual report, which as it is my only military recommendation emphasizes my opinion of the advisability, where I recommend the increase of the number of men in the companies, and the addition of two companies to each regiment.

There is the recommendation of the Secretary of War, the recommendation of the General of the Army who is retired, the recommendation of the present General of the Army, the recommendation of General Schofield, and recommendation after recommendation by the Secretary of War preceding the present Secretary, and the Generals of the Army. So the assertion made by the Senator from Colorado that this bill had its recommendation in the committee alone, and not from any Executive Department, was made without due consideration or examination.

But I pass from that for the present to the consideration of the bill. I shall take up section by section the sections which have been opposed, so that persons who wish to examine into the merits or demerits of the bill can understand its provisions. I call attention to the first section. That section provides:

> That hereafter, in time of peace, all offenders in the Army charged with offenses now punishable by a regimental or garrison court-martial may be brought before a summary court, which shall consist of a commissioned officer of the line second in rank at the post or station of the offender, and who shall hear and determine the offense and adjudge the punishment that shall be inflicted, and shall also make a record of his proceedings and submit the same to his post commander, who, upon the approval of the proceedings in the case, shall order the execution of the sentence, and shall forward the record to the department headquarters for examination and file in the office of the judge-advocate of the department: Provided, That the punishment in such cases be limited to that authorized to be inflicted by a regimental or garrison court-martial.

Inasmuch as there may be some question in reference to this matter I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the object of this provision in the bill. In article 83 of the Articles of War, in the chapter of the Revised Statutes on the subject of the Army, the following will be found:

> Regimental and garrison courts-martial, and field-officers detailed to try offenders, shall not have power to try capital cases or commissioned officers, or to inflict a fine exceeding one month's pay, or to imprison or put to hard labor any non-commissioned officer or soldier for a longer time than one month.

What is the object of this section of the bill? It is to prevent the innumerable courts-martial we find now in the Army. I suppose the Senate will be very much surprised when I give the number of courts-martial of men and officers during the last year. In the report of the Secretary the following will be found:

Department of Arizona	682
Department of California	691
Department of the Columbia	1,077
Department of Dakota	2,177
Department of the East	1,840
Department of the Missouri	2,267
Department of the Platte	1,876
Department of Texas	1,151
Inferior courts-martial convened by commanders of corps under the eighty-first article of war	90
Total	11,851
Tried by general courts-martial	2,328
Total number tried by courts-martial	14,179

Mr. DAWES. More than half.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, more than half the soldiers are included in trials by general courts-martial and by inferior courts-martial under the Articles of War, trials for certain character of offenses denominated in the Articles of War; the others, garrison, regimental, and different characters of courts-martial.

I have tried to obtain a statement as to the expense incurred by these courts-martial during the last year, but have been unable to do so, but I find only the mileage of witnesses and other expenses incident to it, without calculating the heavier expenses. That which I have obtained amounts to $14,000.

The object of the bill is to do away with the assembling of officers every day in the year to try minor offenses such as would confine a poor soldier in the guard-house for a week or ten days, such as would deprive him of a month's pay, such as would not imprison him longer than one month, which are more numerous in the detailed statement of these courts than any other.

Some persons may say that the soldier is entitled to a trial by court-martial. What is a trial by court-martial of a soldier who merely commits some slight offense? It is merely calling officers together to say that he should go into the guard-house for a month, or that he shall have his pay reduced two weeks, three weeks, or a month; and that is all.

So it is not for a serious offense, it is not for a felony, it is not for a heinous crime; it is just such a case as in our States justices of the peace are given jurisdiction over, some small, minor offenses that we do not wish to carry into the courts for the purpose of making a heavy expense.

In that case we provide that the second officer in command at a post shall be the officer before whom such person may be arraigned—not that he shall be, but that he may be. For instance, the officer in command, if it is a slight offense, instead of assembling a court-martial—and probably he would have to send to other posts for officers—will summon the second officer in command and say, "Here are the charges against this man; he was out last night," or something like that. He hears the case and determines it, and that is the end of it. It is for the purpose of having the case summarily disposed of.

I wish to say to the Senate now that in what little experience I have had in military affairs, for which I do not claim any credit, nor do I claim that it has been extensive, but during the time I served in the Army, far back many years ago—so long ago that I should dislike to state the time—I learned a lesson, and it was that kindness to soldiers and the infliction of moderate punishment instead of severe punishment made the better soldier. When I organized a regiment to enter the Union Army and commanded it for months I never tried a man by a court-martial, and I had a regiment that thought I was at least a fair man. I tried them myself. Every man who committed an offense not punishable with a severe penalty under the Articles of War, I called up before me and put him to chopping wood, or put him on extra duty, or sent him to the guard-house for an hour or for five days. I never had any trouble with my regiment when I commanded it; and during the whole war I had fewer courts-martial in my command than any man who ever commanded the same number of troops; and yet I think I have had as good soldiers under me as anybody. That was the mode which I adopted. I suggested it to my inferior officers, and they adopted it.

I say that is a better plan to-day for the government of soldiers in the Army than the plan for trying minor offenses by court-martial. Why? Because the immediate officer in connection with the troops knows the character and disposition of the men; he understands their faults, their vices, and their virtues. He knows all about them, and he will deal more generously with them and more kindly and more promptly than a court-martial will do.

For that reason I drafted the first section, and submitted it to some of the leading officers of the Army. Every one of them agreed to it. Several years ago I suggested it to leading officers in the Army and they thought it over. They have written me letters saying it was the true policy and the best one. General Schofield adopts it and writes me a letter indorsing it. General Sheridan adopts it. Every one I have spoken to in the Army adopts it as being the best rule that could be devised for the trial of soldiers for minor offenses.

We discussed yesterday—and I have said about all I care to say in reference to it—the increase of the Army, and the increase of the pay of the private soldiers and the sergeants. I now desire to call the attention of the Senate to another provision in the bill which I desire to explain while I am up. Section 4 provides:

That officers of the Army stationed at military posts apart from settlements may, with the approval of the department commander, each employ one private soldier as a servant: Provided, That the consent of such soldier shall be first procured, and that the sum of $20 per month during the period of such employment shall be charged against the officer employing him.

There is a reason for that provision. We find that at many of the posts out in the far West, away from settlement, out in the mountains, and on the plains there is no opportunity for the officers to employ persons as cooks or men to take care of their horses. The law provides that they shall not employ a soldier. They have what is called officers' messes, where a few officers get together and mess, buy their provisions, and employ somebody to act as a cook and as a servant. Often they can not find persons to employ, so that it is a great hardship. But there are many soldiers in the Army who were employed in occupations of that kind prior to entering the service, and who prefer it really to doing the duty of a soldier in the line. It has always been the case, until not long since when a law was enacted prohibiting the use of soldiers as servants in the Army. We provide that where the soldier consents, where it is his desire, he may be so employed. The officer can not employ him at his will, but it must be submitted to the department commander. If the department commander approves then the officer may employ a soldier for the performance of that character of service, and there will be deducted from the officer's pay $20 per month. This is the object of that provision.

Although some Senators think that if you should ask an Army officer for any advice you are sure to get the advice that will be to his interest, and no other, I presume that officers of the Army are like other men. I have always found them so. I do not see that it changes the character or disposition of a man because he becomes an officer of the Army. He may become a little more rigid in discipline, but if he is a gentleman when he enters the Army he will remain a gentleman. If he is an honest man he remains an honest man. If he is a bad man he does not often reform. So if you inquire of the Army officers you will find the universal response that it is impossible on the frontier to employ the necessary service that is required by them and for them, and therefore there are no means by which this service can be performed except through soldiers.

You will find also that it would be better to have a law authorizing it than to find a violation of law. On a campaign against the Indians or any one else, when the officers have to attend to their duties, see to the details in reference to their commands, issue their orders, examine maps, ascertain where they have to go, find out in some way about the enemy, if they are in search of an enemy, an officer has enough to do without turning cook or hostler. He must have somebody. So you find that a soldier will volunteer to do it. You will find that kindness existing between the officer and the soldier always. Therefore it is better to put it in the law and say that he may have this service provided the man is paid for it and it is deducted from the officer's pay, so the Government does not lose the service of the soldier but the Government receives the pay.

Then section 5 provides:

That officers serving away from their stations as members or judge-advocates of courts-martial or courts of inquiry, or as members of military boards, shall receive a per diem allowance of $2.50.

I will state the reason for this. Where an officer is at his post and has his mess he has his provisions. If he travels for the purpose of being on one of these boards, commissions, or courts-martial, he is at extra expense. He goes to a hotel, pays his expense, and, therefore, we propose to allow him $2.50 a day in order to cover his extra expense. Then following, in section 6 we provide:

That the Secretary of War may authorize the employment at the headquarters of military divisions, departments, and districts of civilian clerks in place of the general-service clerks now authorized for such employment, at rates of compensation not to exceed those paid to other civilian clerks employed at such headquarters by officers of the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments.

The object of this provision will be readily seen by those who understand it. What is called a service clerk in the Army is where a man enlists as a clerk. He is enlisted in the Army, but he is enlisted for that particular service, for so many years, under military rule and military discipline. We thought it was better to not have that character of clerks enlisted in the Army, drawing rations, high pay, and all that sort of thing, but that we should have clerks employed, provided the Secretary of War thinks proper. It is not compulssry, but it is left to his discretion to have a different character of clerk, that is to say, a civilian clerk, the same that is employed in other departments to perform such clerical duties as book-keeping at headquarters, &c. At least until recently that was the character of service the Army has always had, and we think it is better, and in fact many officers of the Army think it is much better. Then section 7 provides:

That the pay of chaplain shall be, from the 1st of July next, $1,800 per annum.

Perhaps the attention of Senators was not called yesterday to this section, and inasmuch as the raid of certain Senators upon this bill was on account of its extravagance, I now call attention to section 7. Under the law now a chaplain receives $1,500 per annum, yet he has the assimilated rank of captain. We thought it was nothing but fair at least to pay the chaplain the pay of a first lieutenant, and so we increased the pay to $1,800.

Any man who is competent to be a chaplain in the Army ought to be worth $1,800. He gets $1,500, the pay of the lowest commissioned officer in the Army. We thought, according to the rank that was given, for any man who is willing to go into the service as chaplain, taking his family as most of them have to do, having to buy the rations for their families, as a matter of course, they are not drawn from the Government—we thought $1,800 was not more than a fair compensation for those men. They have been complaining for years about their meager allowance. For the reason that they have no promotion, their pay never changes. The pay of second lieutenants commences, say, at $1,500 per annum; when he is promoted to be a first lieutenant his pay is increased, and when he is promoted to captain his pay increases, and so on; but a chaplain receives no promotion; his pay is fixed, and never changes except in the percentage for length of service. Therefore we thought that instead of promoting chaplains we would increase their pay to $1,800 per annum. Then section 8 provides:

That officers of the line, except regimental quartermasters, detailed for duty as acting assistant quartermasters, shall be allowed the same additional compensation as is now allowed by law to acting commissaries of subsistence.

Where certain officers are detailed they are allowed $10 per month. We propose to increase the pay of persons of the same class detailed on the same character of duty to the same amount, to equalize the service; in other words, so that one man detailed shall not receive $10 per month while another detailed to perform service of a similar character shall receive nothing.

Going through the whole bill, the intention of the committee was to equalize the payments and duties of the soldiers and officers of the Army and make the Army as efficient as we could possibly do it by law; and that is all the object there is in this bill.

Then we come to section 9 in reference to fuel, which was discussed yesterday.

Section 10 provides:

That any person who has been ruptured while in the line of duty in the Army or Navy shall be provided with a truss of approved pattern under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretaries of War and the Navy, respectively.

My friends who oppose the bill did not refer to any of the sections that I have read this morning. I do not know whether they would be opposed to them or not, but it seems to me that where a man has received this character of injury in the service of his country his country could do no less than furnish him the best class of article that is to be found. Under the law a certain class of soldiers is entitled to have this article furnished by the Government. We provide that the best pattern of improved truss shall be furnished to soldiers and sailors both, where they receive this character of injury. I hope nobody will be found opposed to that.

There is another provision, and as I want to give the Senate the benefit of what little I may know about this bill in reference to every section of it, I call attention to it. Section 11 provides:

That so much of the act making appropriations for the Army approved July 24, 1876, as forbids payment of mileage over land-grant railroads, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I do not know whether there will be opposition to that section or not. The object of the section is this: There is a provision in the law that mileage shall not be allowed to officers traveling over land-grant railroads. If any man will give me a reason why an officer should pay his fare on a land-grant railroad and receive no traveling expenses on that any more than on any other railroad, I should like to know what it is.

Mr. ALLISON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that provision of law was not intended to interfere with the proper mileage of officers.

Mr. LOGAN. But it does.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to have the Senator explain that section in the bill. It was supposed that land-grant railways were obliged to carry the troops and munitions of war. The Government had reduced rates, and I think the War Department fixed 50 per cent. So the object of that statute, as I remember it, was to enable the Government to provide transportation for Army officers while traveling upon duty and receiving on that account from the railways what the original law upon the subject required. Will the Senator explain why the change is now proposed to be made?

Mr. LOGAN. The change is made for this reason: You allow an officer traveling under orders mileage. That is the law.

Mr. ALLISON. But the mileage is intended to cover the cost of transportation. For two years the actual cost of transportation was paid by Army officers. Then mileage was restored. It was supposed that when an officer presented himself to a land-grant railway he was entitled over that road to receive transportation, and that the transportation would be a substitution for the mileage allowed under the law.

Mr. LOGAN. But that is not the way the law is construed. He does not receive it, no matter what was supposed. The law is construed that an officer traveling over a land-grant railroad pays his fare the same as he does when traveling over any other railroad, and when he comes to settle with the quartermaster or paymaster he is not allowed mileage for his traveling expenses.

Mr. ALLISON. He is allowed expenses.

Mr. LOGAN. No, not at all; he is allowed nothing. When an officer is under orders and must travel on a land-grant railroad I can not understand why he, performing a duty in obedience to an order, should not receive his mileage the same as if traveling anywhere else over any other road, on a steamboat, or anywhere else. It is different where an officer is traveling with troops. I am speaking of the case where an officer is traveling under orders without troops.

Mr. ALLISON. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The object of mileage, as I understand it, is to provide transportation for officers traveling on duty, and the mileage provision was inserted in order to avoid a complication of accounts. An officer simply certifies to the number of miles he travels. So the mileage was intended to cover the cost of transportation. The law which is proposed to be repealed was intended to provide that in lieu of mileage over a land-grant railroad actual transportation should be furnished. If the mileage amounts to more than the actual transportation then to that extent the officer sustains a loss, but if the transportation is equal only to the mileage then it makes no difference to the officer whether he receives mileage or transportation.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes a good deal of difference to an officer whose duties are all along land-grant railroads, where he receives no mileage at all, when an officer just 50 miles across whose duties are on roads that are not land-grant railroads receives his mileage. It makes a distinction between the two officers. One receives mileage for all his travel, and the other receives nothing; and why this discrimination should be made against an officer I can not understand. I am not objecting to the provision in general, for I think it just. It is only that part as applying to officers of the Army that it is proposed to repeal, so that an officer of the Army traveling under orders without troops, no matter where he travels, the intention of the law is that he shall be entitled to his mileage, the same as a Senator traveling from here to his home. I suppose that the law allowing a Senator mileage to Oregon does not deduct his mileage while he travels over a land-grant railroad.

There is one thing very true, that members of Congress and all civilian officers, marshals, and everybody entitled to mileage receive their mileage over a land-grant railroad the same as over any other character of road. If that be so, I ask why this burden is imposed alone upon the officers of the Army? I can not understand it, and I hope that this section will not be objected to by the Senator from Iowa, because it is fair, it is just and right.

Section 12 is merely intended to change the character of the language of the section of the Revised Statutes in reference to the mode of punishment. Section 13 provides:

That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to cause the enlistment of competent instructors for post schools, who shall have the rank and pay of ordnance sergeants.

That was commented on yesterday by the Senator from Kansas, and in my reply to him I thought it strange that this objection should be made. Section 14 provides:

That commissioned officers of the Army on the active-list are hereby authorized to make deposits of money with any Army paymaster, not to exceed one-half pay in any one year; and all the provisions and restrictions of the act of May 15, 1872, "establishing a system of deposits," are hereby made applicable to such deposits: Provided, That officers are hereby authorized to withdraw their deposits on the completion of each and every term of three years' service from the date of their first deposit under this act.

Of course around large cities, where there are banking institutions, officers would not do this, but at far-off posts, when the paymaster comes around, when there is no reason for their expending their money, especially the younger officers, it is an inducement to them to give their money, or a portion of it, to the paymaster and let it be credited to them in the Treasury of the United States, and at the end of three years they may draw it out with 4 per cent. interest. A similar provision is applicable to enlisted men. Enlisted men are entitled to deposit their pay with the paymaster or in the Treasury of the United States; they draw 4 per cent. on it, but they can not receive the amount in return until the term of their enlistment expires.

This system has worked well. It has induced many soldiers in the Army to save their earnings, deposit them with the Government, and at the end of their term the soldier has a sum that is really enough sometimes to buy him a little home and to soften the hardships that he would endure should he come out of the service penniless. It is found to be an excellent system; it works well in connection with soldiers of the Army.

So, it having worked well with the soldiers of the Army and being recommended by the Paymaster-General and by other officers of the Army, the committee thought that they would apply it to Army officers, provided the Army officers desired to take the benefit of it. One section which the Senator from Kansas commented on very severely was section 16. That section is as follows:

That hereafter the inspections made of paymasters' accounts, offices, their duties, &c., shall be made by officers of the Pay Department detailed for that purpose, on the recommendation of the Paymaster-General, by the Secretary of War, such detail among paymasters not to be continued for more than one year; other paymasters shall be detailed, and so on, in each year alternating the detail.

As I said yesterday, if that section is objectionable in its present shape, I am perfectly willing to amend it so that there shall be an additional inspection, for that is the intention of it. A man who understands paymaster's accounts as a paymaster does is better qualified to inspect them than a man who knows nothing about keeping accounts.

But the Senator from Kansas objected because under this system a man by the name of Hodges perpetrated a defalcation. I presume that Hodges would have perpetrated that defalcation under any character of inspection, for this reason, and the Senator I hope approves it when I call his attention to it: The Military Committee reported a bill to the Senate, which was passed and is a law now, providing against exchanging of checks, which I am told at that time caused the defalcation. It was the manner of then doing the business. The inspector could not detect it, because one paymaster when another one was going to settle his account on a certain day might give in his check for a certain amount, and he settled by that check, and then he rechecked back again, and settled with him. In that way they balanced the accounts and the defalcation occurred under this system. That system has been changed. But the Senator from Kansas was mistaken. I have a report from the Paymaster-General in which he says:

There have been two defalcations, and two instances of misuse of public funds in the Pay Department since the Hodges defalcation, and these were not discovered under the present system of inspection.

So the mere charge that a paymaster would not inspect as well as somebody else for fear that he might be inspected the next year, has no very great weight in my judgment. It is only the character of criticism that has been made all along so far as this bill is concerned.

As I said, I am perfectly willing, if that section is not satisfactory to the Senate, to make an amendment to it that will make it satisfactory, because I deem it very important.

I was very sorry yesterday to hear the character of remarks that were made by certain Senators in reference to the Army. Why should Senators speak of the Army in other terms than it deserves? Why should a soldier, because that is his profession, who is at all times ready to perform his duty toward his Government, be unsparingly and unnecessarily criticised? I can not understand it. I have no heart for such a case as this. I am willing that criticism should be made where criticism is deserved, but when made merely without cause, without reason, and unjust in every particular, I do not admire it. Now, let me read for a moment. "The Senator from Illinois," he said, speaking of myself, "was willing to expend from six to seven million dollars" for what? "For show." And then he said:

Done for show! Six or seven million dollars added by the bill to our expenses just simply in order that there may be more frills and furbelows, more pompons and cockades and shoulder-straps and stripes and so on, more of the glitter and tinsel of military life at a cost of six or seven million dollars a year!

More show, more tinsel, more everything connected with the Army, at a cost of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000! The Senator does know, for he is not an ignorant man, that that statement has no foundation in fact. He does know that it will cost no such amount, nor a third of that amount. He does know that it is not for tinsel nor for show that this proposition is made.

In response to a remark that I made about the meagerness of some of the companies, that the officers themselves took no delight in exhibiting themselves before the public, he said that instead of the officers being ashamed on account of the orgaaization and its paucity in numbers the soldiers are ashamed of their officers, and he agrees with them.

Mr. PLUMB. Please read what I did say about that.

Mr. LOGAN. I will, if I can find it. I presume I can. If the Senator will call my attention to the paragraph I shall read it with great pleasure.

Mr. PLUMB. Quote correctly if you quote at all.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know whether I can find it. I remember what the Senator said. Is not that what he did say?

Mr. PLUMB. I said they were ashamed of officers who deserted them and left their command.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not so understand the Senator, but he may have said that. I must confess I have not read the Senator's speech. I think it was a very able one. If the Senator will find that paragraph for me I will read it.

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all. You quoted it and you can take the responsibility.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not very kind. I do not want to misquote the Senator. I will find it, however, and read it so as to have it correct. That was the substance of what the Senator said.

Now, sir, I say in the presence of this honorable Senate that if the Army of the United States is merely for show, whose officers are to be decorated with tinsel and are of such characters that their soldiers are ashamed of them, then the Senator from Kansas ought to introduce a bill to abolish the whole Army. If it is of the character mentioned, if it is subject to such criticism and character of criticism, it is unworthy the name of an American Army, and should be abolished.

I mentioned yesterday the fact that I thought we ought to have fortified points and places along the Atlantic coast, around the Gulf, covering the mouth of the Mississippi River, and on the Pacific coast. I repeat that, and I say further that if you carry out the scheme proposed by this administration or by its friends—and I do not criticise it—of increasing your fortifications, where are your men to man the guns? Where are they? They are not in the Army. To build the character of fortifications that ought to be erected for the protection of our coast line and our large cities you would have to enlist men in order to man the guns on those fortifications. But fresh soldiers are not the best soldiers. There is no one here who has ever seen service in any army who does not know that the old soldier who learns his duty well is more to be relied upon than the man who does not understand his duty. It has always been so, and always will be so. Say what you will, that remains true.

Let us examine the bill fairly and deal justly with it. If the people of this country desire no army, no navy, that is well. I do not agree with them if that is their view. As I said yesterday, if there is a government now beneath the rays of the shining sun that ought to have an army of at least creditable efficiency it is the Government of the United States.

Sir, the very presence of troops gives peace anywhere where people are not in a state of revolution. The very fact that you have an efficient army, small though it may be, is a fact known to the world and is a protection to that extent. The very fact that you have fortifications covering your points of great interest in this country, on your coast lines, is a notice to the people from everywhere that you are prepared for any emergency. The government that goes unprepared for long years finally finds the necessity comes upon it; that emergency must arise sooner or later. It will not do to say that this country will never be troubled with foreign nations. It will not do to say that this country will never engage in war. I hope to God she never will. I hope that wars may cease throughout the world, and that the benign influence of peace may hover around the people everywhere. That is my desire, but at the same time I have that desire I have the same desire that our Government shall be in a condition to assert its rights and protect itself.

Mr. President, I have said about all that I care to say in reference to this bill. I have many documents that I might read for the purpose of sustaining the proposition in the bill and for the purpose of showing that there is no such intention in this connection as has been attributed to the movers of it. Strange it is, however, that men will insinuate that there is an intention unworthy of its promoters. A newspaper also has been induced to make the same assault upon this bill, though the same proposition has been made year after year, recommended in time of peace, in time of outbreak, persistently recommended by the War Department and the generals of the Army. To attribute motives to it now different from what is designed strikes me as being unworthy of honorable Senators.

Now, sir, whatever may be the fate of the bill I have at least tried to do my duty toward my country in reference to it by giving them a warning that our Army and Navy ought to be in better condition than they are to-day, and that the paltry sum asked for in this bill should not stop or stay the hand for a moment from making preparation and giving efficiency to our little Army. No, sir, extravagant statements may go out to the country, extravagant criticisms may also go out for the purpose of preventing justice being done the little Army that now belongs to this Republic, but the time will come when the people of this country will appprove of the attempt that is now made in the Senate to give efficiency to the Army of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the general details of the bill, nor to discuss it at any very great length, and while I address the Senate I shall endeavor to keep my temper. I do not myself see any occasion for heat or excitement in discussing a question or this kind. I believe it is the right of every Senator if he disapproves of a bill to make his objection known to the Senate. It is true he may not do it in the dignified way in which the support of the bill has been carried on by the Senator who reported it. It may be that the opposition is in error, and it may be that that opposition is discreditable to the Senate, but every man is expected to present his case as best he may. It can not be expected that every one will present his case with the courtesy and urbanity and ability of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs when he presents a matter to the Senate. His long experience enables him to do those things, keeping always in sight all the ethics of Senatorial courtesy. He of course can not expect the rest of us to do that.

The main answer the Senator made to my objection to the bill yesterday was that on some great occasion, when a large number of soldiers were parading, showing the signs of service, at which of course the honorable Senator was present, he did not observe my face. Mr. President, I was not there. I have never made any boast of having been in the Army. I have never made this Chamber ring with the statements of the service I had rendered to the country, either in the Army or anywhere else. We all know that the Senator from Illinois was in the Army. We are not likely to forget it, for if the Senator should fail to remind us of it on every occasion, the very change in his methods of treating us in the Senate would call our attention sharply to the fact.

I think it is a merit to have been in the Army. I concede that to the distinguished chairman of the committee. I concede that he was a distinguished soldier, and when it comes to questions of detail regarding a bill of this character I yield my judgment to his. But I have yet to learn that service in the field has anywhere especially qualified men for the discharge of legislative functions. I have yet to learn that in the history of the world the men who have made their mark in legislative life, in the civil forum, have received their education on the tented field. I think that some men may know some things without having been in the Army.

It is not at all strange to me that the honorable Senator assumes to know more of military affairs than I do. I concede it; I yield it. I am sometimes surprised when he claims for himself more information upon this subject than all others who were in the field as well as himself. But yet that is a matter of taste, and I pass on from that to the bill itself.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me? I do not know of any very offensive language that I used toward the Senator to cause him to be so irate or critical.

Mr. TELLER. I am in the best of temper.

Mr. LOGAN. When the Senator says that I am always claiming to know more about military matters than other men, I will say to him that that is an unfair statement, unjust and untruthful, and he knows it.

Mr. TELLER. All right, Mr. President, I will leave the Senator's declaration so oft repeated in this Chamber to answer what he has now said. The Senator says he has not been offensive. Who said that he had been? I believe he commenced this debate with the assertion that there was a combination of Senators here—at least that is the way it is reported—that there was a combination of Senators to fight this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, it was not——

Mr. TELLER. He insinuated in his speech——

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EUSTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TELLER. When I get through the sentence I will yield. He at least insinuated that the opposition to the bill came because he reported the bill. Now, if the Senator wants to make any explanation I will hear it.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I have no explanation to make. I will just repeat what I said, for the Senator has misquoted me. I said that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] received encouragement from other Senators. That was the language I used, and that is the way it is reported; but I did not know that the Senator from Colorado took it to himself, for he had not opened his mouth at that time. But if the shoe fits he can wear it. That is all.

Mr. TELLER. I did not so understand the Senator when he made his remark.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I said.

Mr. TELLER. I understood the Senator to say when he made his remark—and I believe that is the way it went to the country in the press; of course it was the fault of the press—that there was outside opposition. I understood that it did not refer to me at all; I understood it did not refer to any member of this body, but referred to a gentleman whom it is not perhaps worth while to mention. I looked at the RECORD next morning——

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word right there? I want to say to the Senator that if there is anything on earth that would induce me to believe there was a desire on the part of some gentlemen in this Senate to cause bad feeling between persons, it is the very remark he has made now. I said nothing, uttered no word in reference to any man outside of this Chamber, nor did I insinuate any such thing, and the Senator ought to know it. His attempt to have it go to the country that I was attacking any man outside of this Chamber or in it is unworthy of the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not know what the Senator said; I know what was in the RECORD.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not in the RECORD.

Mr. TELLER. I know what I thought he said, but of course I was mistaken. I said I understood him not to refer to anybody on the floor. I think other Senators perhaps were also in the same error with myself. We are bound to assume of course that just what appeared in the RECORD was exactly what the Senator said. I am not raising any question of veracity between him and the RECORD. We all understand of course that the RECORD is an exact statement of what everybody says, and that when a man loses his temper sometimes and says things that he would not otherwise say, he does not correct the RECORD—not at all.

Opposition from other Senators! One Senator had spoken, and only one, against the bill; and one Senator had spoken for the bill besides the Senator who reported it. It seems to me, with all due respect to the distinguished Senator from Illinois who reported this bill, that there is an undue feeling on his part of complaint when opposition is made to the bill. There was the insinuation made as I said—I will read it so that it may not be misunderstood:

> My friend from Maine who is absent—and therefore I will not refer to him now—was doubtless encouraged by the opposition of other Senators to make war upon this bill at the start. I know not why. I think good fortune would perhaps have come to this bill more certainly had it been reported by some one else.

Mr. LOGAN. Is there anything there about any outside man?

Mr. TELLER. Ah, Mr. President, that is the way it is in the RECORD. I was only speaking of the impression on the human organs of hearing when I said I understood it differently. That was not the fault of the Senator, of course, but it was my own. Opposition of other Senators making war upon the bill! Why, Mr. President, have not the members of the Senate who do not happen to belong to the Military Committee the right to pass upon so simple a question as the question as to whether it is wise, prudent, and proper in this hour of decreasing revenue and increasing expenditures to add permanently from two and a half to three million dollars to the public expense, without having it said that they are making war upon the bill, or that they are making war upon a gentleman distinguished for his military knowledge and his standing in this Senate?

The honorable Senator said the newspapers talked about this. I believe even the newspapers have intimated that this was a war upon the Senator because of certain supposed aspirations that he might have. How false they are of course everybody must know.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Senator will allow me, as I suppose he wants to be correct——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I said this morning that certain newspapers had attributed the same motives to me that Senators had; that is, it was insinuated that the five thousand increase in this bill was not for the purpose of making the Army efficient, but was for the immediate purpose of something that was transpiring. That was the insinuation, and I said the newspapers had made the same insinuation.

Mr. TELLER. That is all I said, Mr. President. I simply said, first, that the Senator had alluded to the newspapers, and then that the newspapers had even taken up the same suggestion, not the suggestion that he had made, but the suggestion that I have made now, that this opposition to the bill was perhaps introduced for the purpose of destroying the aspirations of somebody in this Chamber.

For myself, sir, I disclaim any desire to attack the committee. I disclaim any desire to attack the chairman of the committee. I reserve for myself on this Senate floor the right to express my opinions without being called to task or called to account by the Senator from Illinois or anybody else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EUSTIS in the chair). The Senator from Colorado will suspend his remarks. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the bill be read at length.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the bill will be laid aside temporarily, and that we may go on with the Army bill until it is finished.

Mr. PLATT. Let me say one word here.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know that I ought to allude to the fact that the turn the debate has taken on the Army bill is not making it exactly a pleasant debate at the present time; that it might be more pleasant if it were resumed on a future occasion. But with reference to the bill for the admission of Washington Territory I desire very much this afternoon to make the statement upon which I, having reported the bill, rest the claim of Washington for admission into the Union. I do not know that it will be practicable for me to make it at any other time, and I am also aware of the fact that the Senate is likely to be thin when I make it, and I want it to go into the RECORD. I think if Senators will do what I suppose they do, read the remarks I shall make in the RECORD, that will go far toward helping the passage of the bill. I am very anxious to go on this afternoon, and I trust the Senator from Illinois will not make the request to continue the consideration of the Army bill at this time. It seems to me the debate is taking such a turn that to consider that bill further at this time will not facilitate its passage, and he knows that I am in favor of the bill, and I hope he will allow me to go on.

Mr. LOGAN. I have given way to every measure that has come up. I gave way to measures proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Vermont, and others. To every measure that has come up I have quietly given way; and it does seem to me that there is about as much importance to this bill as to some others. So far as the character of the debate is concerned, I have tried to state the facts about the bill; and if the remarks of the Senator from Colorado are not satisfactory to the Senator from Connecticut they are perfectly so to me. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that the remarks of the Senator from Colorado are not disturbing me in the slightest, and I should like to go on with the bill. I hope the Senate will allow it to be done. I do not like to have speech after speech made against this bill published in the RECORD and sent to the country, and no disposition made of it, and no reply made to those arguments except the very weak one possibly that I have made. I hope the Senator will allow that bill to go on. We can certainly finish it this evening.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CULLOM. Will my colleague allow me to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce was made the special order for to-day at 2 o'clock. I should like to know, having some interest in the bill, what becomes of it in case the unfinished business continues or the bill represented by the Senator from Connecticut is taken up at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is now before the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not understand the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. What is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill for the admission of Washington Territory as a State.

Mr. PLATT. I trust I may be excused——

Mr. CULLOM. I do not desire to antagonize either of the bills now pressing for consideration if the understanding is had that the bill to regulate commerce will come up immediately after they are disposed of, but I do not intend to consent to that bill losing its place so that we shall not reach it very soon.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to make one statement. I will say this and say it truthfully: I never have antagonized a bill that has been before the Senate when it was under discussion by any bill that I had charge of. I have always given way; whatever may have been said about my temper this morning makes no difference; I have done it uniformly. I am always willing to do it; but where we have gone into a measure like this and it has been before the Senate for two days, now to lay it aside for the purpose of taking up another measure I think would be unjust to those who have charge of this bill. It is not exactly the thing to do, in my judgment.

If I antagonized the bills of other gentlemen I should expect them to do the same with me; but I never do it, and there is no Senator here who can say I have ever done it at any time or on any occasion. I have waited with this bill patiently until everything else was over. It was called up while we were discussing the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont. Senators came around me and said, "Let it go over until they are determined." I agreed to it provided they would take up this bill and dispose of it at the conclusion of these resolutions, and that was the understanding. Now, if it is to go over again I shall come to the conclusion that it is impossible for me to get a measure considered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask if we can not have unanimous consent, or have the unanimous sense of the Senate that the special order shall stand, to be taken up and be the special order when the unfinished business is disposed of. I suppose indeed that is the rule of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. That is all I desire. I do not desire to antagonize my colleague in the consideration of the bill that he represents or the Senator from Connecticut in reference to the Washington bill. The only thing I wish is that the special order fixed for 2 o'clock to-day shall be considered by unanimous consent as having the right of way after those two measures are disposed of.

Mr. PLATT. I think I am the one who is being asked to give way. This bill for the admission of Washington Territory was reported at the last session, and members who are familiar with the subject will remember that I was appealed to and I gave way and gave way and gave way till finally it was not considered at the last session. The bill of the Senator from Illinois was taken up in the morning hour and was running along through the morning hour in successive days.

It will be remembered that at the close of the debate on the resolutions relating to the production of papers I moved that evening to take up this bill and there was not a quorum voting, and then yesterday I moved at 2 o'clock to take it up and it was taken up. Then the Senator from Illinois asked that the bill which had been under discussion during the morning hour might proceed, and that was allowed him yesterday.

I feel that I am entitled to the consideration of the Washington bill at this time. I do not feel that I am exhibiting any feeling or am trying to push any Senator aside. What I said was, and I repeat it, that I am very anxious to say what I desire to say in statement this afternoon at some time.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, will the Senator allow the Senator from Colorado to finish his speech?

Mr. TELLER. It is perfectly indifferent to me.

Mr. LOGAN. I was speaking to the Senator from Connecticut. And after the Senator from Colorado shall conclude, then I will give way for the Senator from Connecticut to make his speech, and then let the Army bill be continued.

Mr. PLATT. If I can have an understanding that at any time before the afternoon is so far worn that I can not conclude my remarks to-day I may have the floor, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. LOGAN. I am willing to agree to that if it is satisfactory to the Senator from Connecticut, that after the Senator from Colorado is through the Senator from Connecticut then can make his statement.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to have a further understanding. Do I understand that what the Senator from Connecticut wants is to make a speech about his bill and that he does not care to press its passage?

Mr. PLATT. I do not suppose I can have the consideration of the bill concluded this afternoon; but I should be glad to say what I have to say upon it this afternoon.

Mr. PLUMB. You want to sandwich it in to-day, to-morrow, and so on? Is that the idea?

Mr. PLATT. It is not. The bill is now the unfinished business.

Mr. PLUMB. Then why not go ahead with it?

Mr. LOGAN. My idea was that the Senator from Connecticut should make his speech and then let us go on with the Army bill. That was my suggestion.

Mr. HALE. The trouble with that will be that we should not get the benefit of the whole day so that we could finish the Army bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know but what we shall finish the bill unless the Senator has a long speech to make.

Mr. HALE. Probably half an hour.

Mr. LOGAN. I would rather have something to say about the bill I am managing if I can be permitted to do so. I should like to have it continued after the Senator from Connecticut is through with his remarks. If that is satisfactory to him, I am perfectly willing to agree to that; and then when he concludes we can go on with the Army bill.

Mr. PLATT. If I can go on now, I have no objection at the close of my remarks to having the Washington bill laid aside informally, retaining its place as the unfinished business, and then take up the bill of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HALE. Is it not better to let this Army bill go over until to-morrow?

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent that the bill to regulate commerce shall be the next business in order at 2 o'clock after the disposition of the two measures represented by my colleague and the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the special order for to-day shall become the special order after the pending business is finished and also the Army bill.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the bankruptcy bill, which is the special order after the Senator's bill, included in that order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion?

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not propose to commit myself so far in advance. I do not know what may come up.

Mr. HOAR. I understand these two bills have already been made the special order for to-day and to-morrow, and all that I ask now is that the Senate will consent that these two measures may go on without destroying the rights of these bills. I think the Senator from South Carolina will see that that is fair.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to these two bills going on just as they are.

Mr. HALE. I believe there is another measure that has precedence, which is in the charge of my colleague, who is away.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina withdraw his objection?

Mr. BUTLER. If I know exactly what I am objecting to, I may. I objected to the arrangement suggested by the Senator from Illinois farthest from me [Mr. CULLOM].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] asked unanimous consent of the Senate that the interstate-commerce bill, the special order for to-day, should become the special order after the unfinished business of to-day and after the bill to increase the efficiency of the Army are disposed of.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to that arrangement so far in advance.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will not object. The commerce bill has the right of way, and it has been postponed now quite a long time because as far as I am concerned I did not desire to interfere with anything else. These two measures are before the Senate for consideration, and it would seem but fair on my part that they should be allowed to be disposed of; and I hope I shall not be deprived of the right I have now by doing so.

Mr. BUTLER. I think it very likely that at the proper time I shall assist the Senator from Illinois in getting the bill up, but I do object to making this arrangement so far in advance.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose a motion be made to postpone the bill of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] until to-morrow at 2 o'clock, would it not then stand with the same rights as it has now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would come up as the special order to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. PLATT. Subject, as I understand the rules, to the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Subject to the unfinished business until disposed of.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I will make that motion for the purpose of getting this out of the way at the present moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] moves that the interstate-commerce bill be made the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. MORGAN. It takes a two-thirds vote to carry that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on that motion. [Putting the question.] It takes two-thirds, and the Chair rules that two-thirds have voted in the affirmative. So the motion is agreed to.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I hope the Senator from Connecticut will agree to my proposition.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection. I shall be perfectly satisfied with that.

Mr. LOGAN. Then let the Senator from Colorado go on and finish his speech.

Mr. PLATT. It is understood, then, that the unfinished business shall be laid aside informally to allow the Senator from Colorado to conclude his speech? ["Yes!"]

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. I hope no one will discommode himself for me, for it is perfectly immaterial to me whether I speak to-day or to-morrow or some other day. If the bill is going forward and is before the Senate for consideration I shall proceed to submit a few more remarks on it.

I am glad that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is not disturbed by anything I have said. I did not intend to disturb the Senator. I only wanted to bear witness to his courtesy and his Senatorial dignity, and I am sure that ought not to disturb him at any time. He said yesterday in debate, which is not in the RECORD and which I can not therefore refer to in detail, that there had been an unfair attack made on this bill and made the intimation that there had been an unfair attack made on him; that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and myself had asserted that he wanted the Army for the purpose of display; that he wanted the Army for show; that he wanted an army that the people of the United States might take pride in. I did so state.

I did state that there was no necessity for the increase of the Army, in my judgment. I did state that the Secretary of War had not asked for an increase of the Army, and I so state now. The Secretary of War in the report he made never intended to recommend an increase of the Army. If the Secretary of War is in favor of the increase of the Army from twenty-five to thirty thousand men, adding one-fifth more to it, it would have been very easy for the committee to have come here with the declaration in an official manner from the Secretary of War to that effect. The remarks that he made in favor of an increase of the Army might as well be used for the purpose of increasing the Army to one hundred thousand men as to thirty thousand.

The report of the Secretary of War in 1883, that has been read, was not intended to recommend an increase of the Army, but a reorganization, and a reorganization alone. And when it comes to a question of that kind, when it comes to a question simply of reorganization, I shall submit my judgment to the judgment of the committee—the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Nebraska and other members of the committee—because that is a subject which they have had opportunity of knowing better than myself. But I must reserve to myself the right to pass upon such questions as their training and experience can not better fit them for judging of than my own can me.

The honorable Senator from Illinois says that it is unfair to say that he wants this increase for the purpose of display. He asserted on the floor of the Senate, as I read the other day and as I will read again if necessity requires, that there is no other purpose substantially than for the purpose of display. He said it was not needed for war now or hereafter; but he did say that the officers of the Army did not have proper pride in the Army because of the paucity of numbers in their regiments; and he made illustrations of the feeling of humility with which an officer saw his company come out shorn of its requisite numbers, as he supposed.

The Senator put himself clearly upon the record, denying in the most emphatic and positive terms the purpose for which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] suggested that this bill might have been introduced, saying it was the farthest possible from his thoughts. I did not charge upon him that any such purpose existed in his mind either when he introduced the bill or when he reported it; and I can not see why the Senator should regard as uncourteous a fair criticism of a principle, a fair criticism not of details but of the main principle presented, whether you will add to the expenses of the Army $2,000,000, as he says, and as was demonstrated yesterday much more than that, not for one year but for all time to come.

I do not think that the inferences I drew from the Senator's remarks were anything but the logical inferences to be drawn. He said that this increase was not necessary for Indian war, it was not necessary for foreign war, and he disclaimed in vigorous language against the use of it as a police force. That being so, there is nothing left upon which the Senator can urge the passage of this bill at this time, except the simple fact that for ten years he has been urging it upon the Congress of the United States. For ten years he says he has had this bill before the proper committee of the Senate, and for ten years the committee has declined to report his bill. There is then the determination of five consecutive Congresses against this bill; and is it strange that Senators who believe in economy and believe the time has come when there should be some retrenchment in national expenditures, unless some method can be devised to increase the revenue, should suggest that of all places where we can best economize the most striking is an army that the chairman says we do not need for any purpose whatever, who disclaims the intention to have it used for any purpose whatever, and now declares that it is not even to be used for show and parade? Every time we inaugurate a President the avenues of Washington swarm with the large number of soldiers here, and these not being enough, they bring on a few militia. Now, we are not even to have the benefit of that hereafter; they are not to be used for any purpose if the Senator from Illinois is correct.

The Senator says it is unfair to so treat the subject as to declare that the Army costs a thousand dollars per man each year. He says that is unfair. I made no such statement. I spoke of the aggregate military establishment expenses as being over $24,000,000. The Senator speaks of it as $25,000,000—twenty-four million and some odd thousands. To that must be added one or two millions more for the incidental and contingent expenses of maintaining the War Department in connection with the Army. So we appropriate every year in the neighborhood of from $26,000,000 to $28,000,000 for the expenses of the Army. It is perfectly immaterial to me whether the money is spent in transportation or in building barracks or anything else. As long as it is expended and as long as it goes out of the Treasury of the United States the question is not how it is expended; but the aggregate of the expenses can not be denied, and it makes but little difference to the tax-payers whether it goes in one way or whether it goes in another so long as it comes out of the people in the end.

The honorable Senator says you would not have any coast defenses, according to our argument, and he then proceeds to make an argument for the opponents of the bill. I know he said yesterday that he would not make such an argument as I did. I do not expect he would; he does not look at this case from the same standpoint. He is for the bill and I am against it, and I can hardly expect that he would make the same argument that I would on this question. So far as I am concerned I have intended to treat this bill fairly, and I am not quite willing that the Senator should put words in my mouth or attribute to me any belief that I did not express.

The Senator says, "if you are opposed to this bill"—I have not had the pleasure of seeing his remarks in the RECORD, and therefore I can not quote them except generally, for they are not yet in—"if you oppose this bill you are opposed to coast defenses, you are opposed to the building of a navy," and then the Senator goes into a discussion of the benefits to be derived from having coast defenses and a navy, and then he appeals by his remarks to the pride of the people; he would have a nation so great and a nation so strong that everybody would be afraid of it. When the question of coast defenses comes here another and a different question is presented. You can not build coast defenses in a day or a year. When you come here with your Navy bill, it will present another question. You can not build a navy in a day or a year. You can soon build up an army. If you have twenty-five thousand enlisted men when you are calling for a great army, you are practically in the same condition as when you have thirty thousand. If it is a nucleus that you want, twenty-five thousand is as good as thirty thousand. Does anybody suppose that we want an army of thirty thousand men to fight a foreign foe? If we shall have an occasion for an army at all we shall want a big army, I mean when we want to put it on a fighting footing. When we want more troops we shall want them not by the thirty thousand, but we shall want them in great numbers, as we had them when the honorable Senator says he commanded three times the number of troops proposed to constitute the Army by this bill. Then you have to create an army at any time if you need it; and why not create it on a nucleus of twenty-five thousand men or twenty thousand as readily as you can upon thirty thousand? If we need an army at all, it must pass up to hundreds of thousands and not down in the low numbers in the first hundred thousand.

The honorable Senator was nearer right in his first suggestion that it would enable the Army officers to have pride in their commands and in their regiments. I think that is the inducement which makes some Army officers want to fill up; it gives them importance; and men, as I said the other day, would rather command a thousand men than five hundred, and ten thousand than five thousand; but because they want to do that is it the duty of this Government at this time, when nobody is demanding it, when nobody is asserting on this floor or anywhere else that there is a demand at all for an army for any purpose whatever, to add to it in numbers even if it does add to discipline and to efficiency and promptness of execution of the military drill of those who are now in the Army? What great difference does it make whether they right or whether they left, or whether they step with an exact step, as they go out in time of peace? The men who are to do our fighting, when we do fight, the men who have always done it when we have had a war, have not been the regular Army, but the men who have gone in as the Senator went in from civil life; and are they to take lessons of these regulars? When the war broke out if we had had ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand, or fifty thousand men more in the regular Army, would it have added practically to the efficiency of the Army? I doubt it. Would the volunteer have made himself a soldier any quicker because he was put by the side of one of these men who had been serving the Government for years in the capacity of a soldier? Not at all. That is not the way we make soldiers in this country.

The honorable Senator alluded to the fact that he was the poor man's friend. Nobody denies it and nobody doubts it. I have not any doubt that the honorable Senator is in full sympathy with the struggling, laboring masses of the world as much as anybody on this floor. I have never intimated or insinuated that he was not; but what has that to do with the bill? What difference does it make what the sentiments of the Senator may be? He proposes to take from the Treasury this money, and I say in my humble judgment he does not propose to render an equivalent to the people; and because he does not propose to render such an equivalent I think it my duty to vote against this bill, not with reference to what committee it came from, not with reference to any gentleman's aspirations or hopes, but with pure reference to my duty as a Senator upon this floor. And I say to the Senator now there never was a man that lived who could present a bill who had the influence, under the present condition of things, to induce me to go for the bill.

I am as likely to do it at his request as at that of anybody else on the floor. I am not disposed to do it for any man; and I repeat what I said yesterday, that there is no public demand for this, there is no public cry among the people that the Army of the United States shall be increased, even for the purpose suggested by the Senator, that from the multitudes that are tramping through the country looking for work you might take a few and provide them means of transportation and support. The people do not propose that the Government of the United States shall maintain any portion of their number in idleness. If they are not wanted as soldiers you have no right to put them in the Army, and the people do not want them in the Army, and will not have them in the Army unless there is a demand. When there is, the people of the United States will see to it that there is an army commensurate with the demand for its use.

Mr. President, as I said before, I have not attempted to criticise the bill in its details. I have not put my opposition to the bill on any fear of a standing army. I have not put my opposition to the bill on any hostility to any person who would be appointed or on the fear that Democrats would be appointed. I am willing, as far as I am concerned, that the bill shall pass save and except the second section. As I said before, upon the questions of detail I was willing to submit my judgment to that of the committee, because I recognize the fact that the committee are better qualified to deal with such questions than I myself. But upon the question whether there is a necessity for a standing army larger than we have to-day, I have firm and decided convictions. I believe, as I said yesterday, that in my judgment the present numbers of the Army could, without loss to the people and without injury to the Army itself and to its efficiency, be reduced, and very much money that is expended every year in that direction could be saved.

Mr. PLATT. I now ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator proceeds I hope it will be understood that when he is through the Army bill comes up again.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is the understanding.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. PLUMB. That displaces, then, the Washington bill.

Mr. PLATT. Not at all.

Mr. PLUMB. In view of the condition of business, I object.

Mr. PLATT. Do you want to displace the Washington bill?

Mr. PLUMB. I want it either displaced or gone ahead with during some period. I am in that condition now that I want to go on with the business before the Senate, because I have matters to attend to in committee. If the Senator wants the Washington bill displaced, be it so. I think myself that it is fair to this bill and fair to the Senator from Illinois in charge of it that he should use the morning hour. Some weeks ago I was interested in a bill which the Senate was kind enough to take up during the morning hour, and it used up the morning hour for several days and never ran into the unfinished business, which was the resolutions of the Senator from Vermont. I think the morning hour for this bill before 2 o'clock is fair to the Senator from Illinois, and then let the remaining portion of the time be occupied by the Washington bill or the interstate-commerce bill or some other bill which is of equal importance. I will not consent to any arrangement which runs these things together in the manner proposed.

Mr. PLATT. As far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing that after my statement the bill shall be laid aside informally for the debate on the Army efficiency bill to go on. What I do want is to avoid being ground to pieces between the upper and nether millstone. I want to keep Washington Territory——

Mr. LOGAN. Go on with your remarks and we will carry out the agreement.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator from Connecticut will yield I wish to say that I intended to offer some amendments to the bill under consideration. They are of importance enough, I think, to require that they be printed. I submit them at this time for the purpose of having them printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to print will be made.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the bill be read.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I can think of no more interesting or important topic to be considered by the Senate of the United States than the question whether a new member shall be admitted to the national family of States or not. And interesting as the question is I can attribute the thinness of the Senate only to one of two reasons: First, that small topics sometimes receive the greatest consideration in this body; and second, that it is possible Senators think I shall not be able to present this subject in an interesting manner. The latter supposition is not exactly flattering to my personal vanity, and therefore I will assume that the first is the true reason.

I regret that the Senate is so thin; but I will endeavor, without any attempt at speech-making or oratorical effect, to present briefly the claims which Washington Territory, coupled with that part of the Territory of Idaho known as the Pan Handle, has to admission to the Union as a State.

It is now more than eight years since the people of that Territory—and when I say "that Territory" I mean Washington Territory and the Pan Handle of Idaho Territory conjoined—have been knocking at the doors of Congress for admission into the Union. Whatever may have been the reasons for refusal or delay, the scriptural promise, "knock, and it shall be opened unto you," remains yet unfulfilled; but I think there are abundant reasons why refusal or delay should no longer occur.

It was on the 10th day of December, 1877, in the Forty-fifth Congress, as I said, more than eight years ago, that the proposition to admit the people dwelling within the Territory of which I have spoken to participation in the full privileges of American citizenship was first made in a bill introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. Jacobs, who was then the Delegate from Washington Territory; and I call attention to the fact that in that very first bill which was so introduced it was provided that the people in Northern Idaho substantially within the same boundaries as are proposed by the amendment to this bill should be joined to Washington Territory and constitute with them the State for which the bill asked the admission. I do not learn that that bill received special consideration in the House of Representatives. But between the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses the people of that Territory, relying on what they thought was a solemn compact of the United States made when the organic act for Oregon Territory was passed providing for its division into two Territories, and that whenever either of such Territories should have 60,000 population it should be entitled to admission as a State, called a constitutional convention, and in that constitutional convention framed a constitution, and in the Forty-sixth Congress asked to be admitted upon the constitution thus formed.

I ought perhaps to stop here, in view of the discussion which arose on the Dakota bill, to say a word by way of excuse for the people of that Territory in taking this action. Nothing, however, came of it, and the bill now before the Senate is only for an enabling act. In the ordinance of 1787, by the sixth article of compact in that ordinance, it was provided that the territory northwest of the Ohio River, when divided into Territories or States, as they were called in the ordinance, should, whenever such divisions had a population of 60,000, be entitled to admission as a State. If a government can make a compact with a people, a bargain and contract by which it is bound, the Government is bound by that contract or compact. Afterward the provisions of that compact were extended to the territory other than that lying northwest of the Ohio, and subsequently, in 1848, were extended to the Territory then know as Oregon, which it was expressly provided in the act might be divided into two Territories.

In 1878, then, the people living in the Territory north of Oregon and including those of the Pan Handle of Idaho, believing that they had 60,000 inhabitants or would have 60,000 inhabitants before the action of Congress could be had, in a constitutional convention properly called and assembled framed a constitution, and at the next session, the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, as I have said, Mr. Brents, the Delegate from Washington Territory, presented in the House a bill providing for the admission of Washington Territory and the section of Idaho Territory to which I have referred under the constitution which had been framed by the people. That bill met with objections, the same objections which have been urged against the Dakota bill, the objection that that was an improper way in which to seek admission to the Union; and some questions arose about the basis of representation which was provided for in that constitution, that basis not being exactly satisfactory to all portions of the Territory which it was proposed to admit as a State. Nothing was done in the Forty-sixth Congress.

In the Forty-seventh Congress the claim of the people of this Territory for admission was renewed by a bill in the form of an enabling act. That bill was referred to the Committee of the House of Representatives and a favorable report was made on the 9th of March, 1882, by Mr. ALDRICH, of the House, now Senator from Rhode Island, from the Committee on Territories. It is four years since this first report in favor of the admission of Washington Territory was made in the House of Representatives. I think that no action was taken upon it, that it could not be reached upon the Calendar; but the Delegate from that Territory, Mr. Brents, urged it in a speech so thoroughly full of reasons, that it seems to me it was calculated to convince, even then, every person who heard it or who has since read it, that Washington Territory was then, four years ago, fully entitled to admission as a State. At the last Congress bills were introduced in the Senate, one of which was reported favorably to the Senate, the name then suggested for the State being Tacoma, a suggested name which has met with objection and which is now abandoned in the present bill and in the present report.

At the last session of the Senate I tried for weeks and for months to obtain consideration of the reported bill; but other subjects, pressing subjects which seemed to other Senators to be of more importance, were taken up, and the session passed and the Congress expired without action upon it.

It is again reported from the Committee on Territories; and the first thing which I ought to say about it, perhaps, in passing is to allude to the fact that some objections are now for the first time made by some of the people of Idaho Territory to the joining of what is called the Pan Handle of that Territory to Washington. I shall not speak at length with reference to this phase of the subject. I simply say that the first amendment proposed in this bill corresponds geographically to the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives and now before the Senate, annexing a portion of Idaho Territory to the Territory of Washington. The boundaries are identical with the boundaries proposed in that bill of annexation, and I can not believe that there is any serious objection in the Territory of Idaho to the proposed annexation. As I said, it has been proposed for eight years, and it has not been until since this bill has been reported and since the bill annexing this portion of the Territory of Idaho to Washington has been passed in the House of Representatives that there has been a breath of objection to it.

Now, it is undeniably true that a few people in the northwest county of Idaho Territory have petitioned to be set not to Washington but to Montana. I have seen the petition. It embraces a few less than seventy names. It is also true that the people of Southern Idaho have all at once discovered that there is opposition to the division of the Territory of Idaho; but I can not believe that it is general. I can not believe that it amounts to any considerable opposition. One or two public meetings have been held. We have not been informed how many persons attended them. The committee have been informed that the entire Territory was to be canvassed for petitions to Congress against the division of the Territory of Idaho, and petitions have come in here, and less than seven hundred petitioners appear, notwithstanding what we have reason to believe has been a very great effort to obtain petitioners against the division of the Territory of Idaho. It seems to me but another illustration of the fact that "the vigor and success of the war does not always come up to the high-sounding phrase of the manifesto."

This question has been debated in Idaho Territory in various ways during the past eight years. More than once it has been the distinctive feature in the elections in Idaho Territory north and south, and on each occasion it has been overwhelmingly decided not only in favor of the division of Idaho Territory, but the annexation of the northern part thereof to Washington Territory. The legislative body of Idaho Territory has passed with a great degree of unanimity a memorial, memorializing Congress and asking that the Territory be divided and that the northern part be set off to Washington. I can not, therefore, see anything in this opposition, which seems to me feeble and sporadic, except a kind of setting of back fires by parties interested outside of the Territory of Idaho against the admission of the State of Washington into the Union.

Now, why should the Territory of Idaho be divided, and why should the northern part be annexed to Washington? It should be divided simply for this reason, that between Southern and Northern Idaho there runs the impassable barrier of the Salmon River Mountains, impassable in the winter absolutely, and passable in summer only by pack-mules, which follow trails leading up and over the mountains. So the people of the four northern counties of Idaho are entirely shut off, geographically and topographically, from all communication or connection with Southern Idaho, except as they leave their Territory and travel through the Territory of Washington and the State of Oregon to reach the southern portion of their Territory.

I will not further allude to this subject at this time except to say, as I think I am permitted to say under the rules of order, that the Delegates both from Washington Territory and Idaho Territory join in saying that it ought to be done, and that their minds have been in no respect changed by whatever of opposition may have been developed in the Territory of Idaho to the proposition. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is thoroughly acquainted with the facts and circumstances, and will speak upon that subject if it be necessary.

There is every reason, if the Territory is to be divided, why the northern portion should go to Washington rather than to Montana. By association, by the nature of the soil, by the occupation of the people, by their communication with each other, by all the sympathies which exist between different localities it belongs with Washington and not with Montana.

I think I am spending too much time upon this proposition. I come, then, to the question of whether this Territory which I have described is entitled to now constitute one of the States of this Union. It seems to me that the very first question is, what is to be the policy of this Government in the future? Are we to admit all the Territories as new States, or are we to pursue toward our present Territories what may be called the colonial policy? And upon that question, as it seems to me, there can be but one sentiment and to it but one answer. Whatever the future may develop with regard to the acquisition of territory, whatever we may think with regard to Alaska, which is territory acquired outside of what I may call our integral territory, it seems to me that with reference to the territory which we have, which is now circumscribed by the lines which bound upon the map what is called "the United States," there can be no question but that the same rule of admission is to be applied now with regard to those Territories as has been applied in the past. The people of those Territories are not full American citizens, are not fully entitled to the rights of the other citizens of the United States, do not fully illustrate the principles of self-government, until they are admitted to become participants in the general union of the States.

In passing I desire to call attention to a quotation from Senator Seward at the time of the admission of Oregon. Upon this subject he said this, and his words must carry weight and conviction to the minds of every Senator:

> For one, sir, I think that the sooner a Territory emerges from its provincial condition the better, the sooner the people are left to manage their own affairs and are admitted to participation in the responsibilities of this Government the stronger and the more vigorous the States which those people form will be.

And again:

> It is not a good thing to retain provinces or colonies in dependence on the central government and in an inferior condition a day or an hour beyond the time when they are capable of self-government. The longer the process of pupilage the greater is the effect which Federal patronage and Federal influence has upon the people of such a community.

The very declaration which our fathers put forth to the world when they assumed the rights, the duties, and the responsibilities of a government, called as it was the Declaration of Independence, shows what the American idea is with reference to the admission of Territories as States as soon as they have the prescribed qualifications for admission. They are to be independent States just as far as the Constitution and framework of our Government will permit. I would not refer to this if it had not been suggested in the discussion in the case of the admission of Dakota that it was unwise to admit large Territories sparsely populated as States, and that possibly the effect of an increase of Senators in this body might not be entirely happy and for the best interests of the people. I trust I shall show that the resources of this Territory are such that it is not to remain a sparsely settled Territory. I certainly think I shall be able to show that it is entitled now by all the rules which have ever been adopted in the past regulating the admission of new States to become a State, to become entitled to the privileges of Statehood.

What are the conditions of admission? First, there must be sufficient territory; second, that territory must have the requisite population; third, it must have resources which promise development; fourth, it must have a people whose character is a guarantee of a republican form of government.

Now let us apply these tests to the Territory and to the people which ask admission here at our hands. This State, if admitted, will be from east to west about 350 miles in length; from north to south about 200 miles. Its area, including Washington Territory and the portion of Idaho Territory which it is proposed to incorporate with it, will be, as I make it, about 90,000 square miles, including water.

I have seen statements in Idaho papers saying that it would be 100,000 square miles, but my figures make it about 90,000 square miles, or 85,000 square miles excluding the water. There is within this Territory the most beautiful and most beneficent inland sea in the world, Puget Sound. Excluding those waters there are about 85,000 square miles. By comparison, five States only will surpass it in area—Texas, California, Nevada, Colorado, and Oregon. It will be of the size of Kansas and Minnesota combined. It will be one-third larger than all the New England States, and nine-tenths as large in area as New York and Pennsylvania combined—certainly sufficient territory to justify the people in asking admission as a State. It has thirty-seven organized counties, in which all the forms of county and municipal government, according to the American idea of such governments, are in complete and healthy operation.

But as to population—for that is a condition which is always insisted upon, and yet, while always insisted upon, not all of the Territories which have been admitted as States have had at the time of their admission a population equal to the then ratio or unit of representation in the House of Representatives. Of the twenty-five States which have been admitted since the formation of the Constitution eight have not had the requisite population, provided that requisite population was the unit of representation in the House of Representatives. Those eight are Illinois, Florida, California, Oregon, Kansas, Nebraska, Nevada, and Colorado, all of which had less population than the unit of representation at the time of admission.

I believe that the population of this Territory now exceeds the unit of representation in the House of Representatives, which is 151,906, it having been raised from the original limit prior to 1810 by successive enactments from 33,000. It is true that in 1880 the census only showed 74,773. It is also true that a census taken last spring, about a year ago now, showed within Washington Territory proper, not including the people in that portion of Idaho Territory which we propose to incorporate with the new State, only 129,000; but I shall show from the report of the governor of the Territory that that census was not well taken, was incompletely and imperfectly taken, there being no law to compel it to be taken, and the compensation being entirely inadequate, if compensation there was. But taking even that fact, the census as taken a year ago of practically 130,000, and adding to it what, from the best estimate we can obtain, is the present population of the four northern counties in Idaho, 18,000, and you have 148,000, which is practically equivalent to the ratio of representation. But all the sources from which population is estimated show that there are very many more people in Washington Territory than appear by that imperfect, partial, and ill-taken census of a year ago.

For instance, take the vote. The census of 1880 showed 74,773 population. The total vote of 1880, the right of suffrage not having then been extended to women, was 16,765, the ratio of population to vote in the Presidential election 4.7. The total vote in 1882 was 19,498. The population at a ratio of 4.7 would be 91,640, a numerical gain in two years of 16,867. The total vote of 1884 was 41,842, from which subtract the vote of the women who had then been admitted to suffrage, 8,368, leaves the male vote 33,474, showing in 1884 a population, at the ratio of 4.7, the same as the vote of 1880, of 157,756. That was in November, 1884. More than a year (sixteen months) has elapsed since that period, a period during which emigration has been pouring into that Territory with unexampled rapidity. I quote the governor of the Territory in his last message to the Territorial Legislature to the effect that there are now at least 175,000 people in that Territory alone. But, taking the bases of the vote in 1884, 157,756, and adding Idaho, 18,000, you have then 175,756. Let me read what Governor Squire says on that subject, because I admit that the question of population is an important one. On the fourth page of the governor's message, delivered to the Legislative Assembly, session of 1885–'86, is this:

> The census returns of the Territory are notoriously incomplete and can not be taken as a true and sufficient exhibit of the actual population. For example, a communication signed by all the officers of Lincoln County claims that a correct census would increase the reported population of that county fully 40 per cent. The law is manifestly imperfect, because there is no penalty attached to non-compliance therewith. The census returns made by the Territory in 1883 show the total population at that time to have been 92,508. The returns of the census taken by the county assessors in the spring of 1885 show the census then to have been 129,438, an increase during the two years of 36,930.
> The Territorial auditor writes me as follows: "Had the census been properly taken, under an adequate law, the population for 1885 would have certainly been shown to be above 175,000."

That is nearly a year ago. Then the governor goes on to speak of what is shown by the vote which I have alluded to, and closes this topic by saying:

> And inasmuch as a constant stream of immigration has been pouring into the Territory for one year since that vote was taken, there is a strong probability that our present population actually amounts to 175,000 persons.

If you add to that 18,000 for Idaho you have a population of 193,000. That, of course, is the maximum limit. The minimum limit, based upon the imperfect census of last year, can not be less than 148,000. So that, setting aside all question of whether we are not bound as a matter of government compact to admit this Territory when it has a population of 60,000, as I believe we are, and as the best Senators and best Representatives have always held with reference to the Territories with which that compact was made, we have substantially, practically, actually as many population within the Territory as is required for the unit of representation in the House of Representatives.

Before the constitution provided for by this enabling act can be adopted I have no doubt there will be 200,000 people within the boundaries of the proposed State.

Mr. DOLPH. Within Washington Territory alone.

Mr. PLATT. As the Senator from Oregon says, who is much more familiar with the country than I am, within Washington Territory alone. I feel how little, how ill qualified, an Eastern man, who has never visited that Territory—I may say from all I have read and heard that wonderful Territory—is to set forth the real claims for admission which the Territory has.

The resources of this proposed State are abundant and varied. They are such as to promise the most healthy and extensive development of the State. It is not purely an agricultural State; it is not exclusively a mineral State, but it has all those diversified resources which inevitably attract and build up the best population and develop the best civilization which the world has ever seen. In respect of diversified resources it has been said, and justly and truly said, that Washington Territory more nearly resembles the State of Pennsylvania than any other State in the Union. It has first excellent agricultural lands; it has abundance of the precious minerals; it has large coal-fields; it has excellent iron-mines; it has grand water ways, an extensive system of railroads; it has everything in fact calculated to develop a State. I must not omit a most prominent characteristic: it has the most magnificent body of timber that exists to-day in the civilized world. Its timber alone would make it one of the richest States of the Union. I have said in my report upon the bill, and I believe it is the result of a careful and accurate computation, that there could be cut in Washington for thirty-five years as much lumber as is now cut annually in the entire United States before exhausting that immense body of timber. Taking all these resources, which promise development, there can be no question but that this State is to grow rapidly in population, and with a population which is stable in its character and well calculated and suited to uphold the principles of free and republican government.

It is scarcely necessary to particularize in this respect. There is one other source of wealth to which I failed to allude—its fisheries—now coming to be extremely important and capable of almost unlimited development. It has of agricultural lands about 15,000,000 acres, about 10,000,000 of them prairie lands rich as any in the world, and about 5,000,000 of them rich alluvial bottom lands, I say rich as any in the world. Perhaps that is overstating it. I will say that among its agricultural lands are lands as rich as any within the United States, and that all of them are susceptible of profitable agriculture.

These lands yield unsurpassed crops. I have taken from the returns shown in the governor's message the average of the different cereals. Wheat averages 24 bushels per acre, which is the highest in the United States. Oats average 41 bushels per acre, which is the highest in the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. For the whole Territory?

Mr. PLATT. For the whole Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is very high.

Mr. PLATT. Barley yields 39 bushels, which is the highest in the United States. So in those three great cereal crops—wheat, oats, and barley—cultivated now very largely in that Territory, the yield is higher than in any other State or Territory in the Union. Rye averages 14 bushels per acre, which is equaled by Wisconsin and exceeded by Oregon. Buckwheat 24 bushels to the acre, which is the highest. The only crop which does not come up to the average is Indian corn, the average being 28 bushels, and that Territory yielding only 19 bushels to the acre. Of hops the average is 1,317 pounds per acre, the highest in the United States. Potatoes 150 bushels, the average per acre also the highest in the United States.

I speak of this because there should be in a State, in order to make a stable, enduring population, the opportunity for profitable agriculture, and nowhere in the United States does it exist to any greater extent than in the Territory of Washington, and Northern Idaho, which in this respect largely resembles Washington. All of the crops grown in temperate latitudes, as well as all the fruits, can be and are successfully cultivated there.

I have spoken of its timber. I shall not refer to it again except to say that such an immense body of timber, which is so easily attainable at present, has resulted in a large development of the lumbering business, of the ship-building business, and of manufacturing of articles which are made from wood. Ship-building is already a thriving industry. A ship can be constructed there probably more cheaply than anywhere else in the United States. I have somewhere, though I may not be able to find it, an illustration of the proposition which I now make. The timber is especially adapted to ship-building, a large portion of it. Many of the masts of the finest vessels in the world are now obtained in Washington Territory. I have somewhere here a comparison of the comparative cost of ship-building in Washington Territory and in Maine, but I can not lay my hand upon it. I think I am justified, however, from recollection, and I venture to state my recollection on that subject, to say that the cost of building a wooden ship at Port Townsend, in Washington Territory, is not one-half the cost of building a ship of the same size and the same tonnage and the same character in the State of Maine. I think it is even less than that. There were built there during the past year quite a number of ships. Fourteen new vessels were built during the year ending June 30, 1885, of which eight were steam-vessels, amounting to 675.27 tons, and there were sail-vessels amounting to 967 tons, making a total of 1,642.29 tons. Governor Squire, in the message of which I have spoken, gives a list of ninety-two steamers belonging to the collection district of Puget Sound, most of them built within Washington Territory.

I have here a statement of the commerce of Puget Sound, exports and imports, as well as exports and imports for the Territory entered and cleared at Portland, in Oregon, which I shall not stop to read, but it figures up a grand total of imports and exports from that Territory of $10,491,821—by no means an inconsiderable trade. One remarkable fact about that trade is that it is carried in American bottoms almost exclusively. Washington Territory seems to solve the problem whether we can carry on commerce in American bottoms. Of the foreign trade the exports carried in American vessels were over $3,220,000, and in foreign vessels only $385,000. I must not omit the railroads connecting its seaports with the great lakes and with the Eastern railroad system. Eight hundred miles are already in operation in Washington Territory alone; adding 100 miles in process of construction and the railroads in Northern Idaho, and we have not less than 1,000 miles now in operation within the boundaries of the proposed State.

I said that coal and iron were abundant. There are at least nine districts within the Territory where coal is most abundant. Mining operations have been successfully started and are now in active and profitable operation. The output of coal during the past year is estimated at 400,000 tons; and when we remember that the Pacific coast has to depend either upon the British territory which lies above Washington or upon Washington Territory largely for its coal, saying nothing about the amount that is required for local consumption, it is easy to see that coal mining must increase immensely, almost indefinitely. The iron industry is in its infancy, but the ore is inexhaustible and the business must increase.

SALMON FISHERIES.

The canning value of salmon put up during the year 1881, since which I have no statistics, was $2,650,000; largely increased, I am told, since then. I shall not stop to run through the entire business of the proposed State. Let me allude to a single item.

The railroads estimate that they have taken out and are to take out of last year's crop of wheat from Eastern and Middle Washington, by way of Portland, Oreg., 250,000 tons of wheat.

The cut of lumber for 1881 was estimated at 300,000,000 feet. More recent statistics I have for the moment mislaid, but it has been largely increased. Over twenty very large saw-mills, not to mention many of lesser capacity, are engaged in the production of lumber for export. It is exported to the markets of the Pacific coast, of Central and South America, the Hawaiian and other Pacific islands, to Eastern Asia, and to some extent to England and France. Manifestly this trade is susceptible of great development.

Situated as Washington is, in the direct line, so to speak, from San Francisco to China and Japan, certainly to Japan, with its railroad facilities extended as they are to be extended, Port Townsend must inevitably become a shipping port which in some sense will rival San Francisco and Portland for the trade of the East. Already teas destined for Eastern markets are landed at Port Townsend and forwarded by rail.

So you have agricultural and mineral wealth, the precious metals, inexhaustible timber, fisheries, shipping, foreign commerce, all to build up and to build up rapidly this State which now asks admission into the Union.

I forgot to mention its wool clip, which is estimated at 8,000,000 pounds shipped out of the Territory; its cattle-raising interests, it being estimated that 100,000 cattle have been shipped East during the last year. It has 15 national banks, 53 newspapers, daily and weekly, 267 church organizations, 723 school-houses, with a school attendance of 30,000 children, besides a State university, 24 private institutions of learning, embracing colleges, seminaries, and academies. I could read at length its educational statistics from Governor Squire's message. They are extremely interesting, but I shall not detain the Senate or encumber the RECORD by putting them in at length.

Its assessed valuation does not, as I understand, include railroad taxation. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] will correct me if I am wrong. I understand that the railroad escapes assessment; that it does not appear within the assessed valuation of the Territory.

Mr. DOLPH. For the year 1885 probably, and the present year, the railroad is taxed on its gross earnings and not upon the valuation of its property.

Mr. PLATT. The assessed valuation of the Territory, not including the railroad property of the Territory, is over $51,000,000. It is out of debt and has a surplus in its treasury. So far as resources are concerned, so far as financial ability is concerned, ability to maintain and carry on a State government, can a better showing be made for a Territory than is made for Washington Territory? Upon the grounds which I have spoken it seems to me that it is entitled to admission.

I come then to the character of its population, for I agree, as Senator Seward said in discussing the Oregon case, that there may be Territories which I would admit with a less population than was required to make the unit of representation, while I would not admit other Territories if they had a million inhabitants. What has been the character of its settlement, of its occupation? It has been settled and it is occupied mainly by men who have gone from other States in the Union; men who at home have been good citizens, thrifty, industrious, enterprising, the best types of American civilization; who have gone out into that Territory to build up a new State; who are accustomed to discharge the duties and privileges as well as to assume all the responsibility of American citizenship. In my judgment, no Territory ever knocked at the doors of Congress with a better population in all that goes to make up the class of men who are to maintain the institutions of a State than this Territory.

I shall not stop here to allude to some occurrences which have taken place with reference to the Chinamen further than to say that there have been disturbances of that sort in Washington Territory, as there have been in California, but this thing is to be said of the people of that Territory: the law-abiding people, the people who have gone there from the other States of the Union and settled there, who believe in law and the maintenance of law, have taken that thing in hand and dealt with those disturbances without extrinsic aid and without calling in the assistance of the military power. They have dealt with them as well in Washington as they have in California or in Oregon. It is no objection to the people that these things have occurred there. They are as well qualified in this respect to be members of the Union of States as are California, or Oregon, or any of the States in which disturbances occur. In the old-settled State of Ohio but a year and a half ago there were disturbances of a far more dangerous character and more far-reaching in their results than have occurred in the Territory of Washington.

So then I say that every reason, every argument which can be made in favor of the admission of a new State is present here. Why should it not be admitted? Why should not those people have the right to full enjoyment of all the privileges of American citizens? If we prize those rights, if it is the proudest thing that a man can say in this year of grace that he is a citizen of a State of the United States of America, why should we not allow these people to become such citizens? I can conceive of no reason whatever. If public faith and public policy and public justice have not ceased to be recognized considerations these people must come in.

And now, Mr. President, with this statement, which I have purposely made brief, I leave the case, desiring only to refer to another matter, which is somewhat personal to myself as a representative of an Eastern State.

I have heard the suggestion made—I am sure I heard it made in the discussion of the bill for the admission of Dakota—that it was not for the interest of the New England States to admit any more States into this Union, and that the admission of the eight Territories, to say nothing of the possibility that some of them may be divided before their admission as States, will increase the number of the members of this body to ninety-two, while New England must be forever limited to the 12 votes which she has at present. It has even been mentioned that when the human tide completely covers this western area there may be one hundred members of this body, and some Senator—I do not remember who it was—felt called upon to characterize such a membership of the Senate as "a mob."

So it has been thought—I do not believe the thought originated in New England—that the true policy of New England was to prevent, if possible, any addition to the present number of States; that in such a largely increased body as the Senate may become it will be impossible for the New England Senators to care for and protect the interests of their constituents, and thus she will be eventually shorn of a portion of the influence and the strength she now possesses. But speaking as I think I may for the New England States, certainly for one of them, I desire to say that her Senators indulge no such fear.

The policy of New England with respect to national growth has never been one of exclusion or repression; on the contrary, it has been the policy of the admission of new States and the consequent enhancement of national strength. Examine the record, and you will find that opposition to the admission of States has not come from New England either in the Senate or House. We have learned, and we know full well, that we can not maintain our place and influence in the national household by numerical power. It takes but a few years in the great march of national progress to build up new communities that in population and wealth and numerical representation can more than compete with New England. No, sir; we understand if, as we hope and trust, New England is to maintain in the future as she has in the past a conspicuous, if not potential, place in the councils of the nation she must base her claim to such notice on something besides numbers or wealth.

We have learned, indeed we have always realized, that there are invisible forces which can make a small State great; that the true sources of power are in the brains and hearts of a people, be they many or few. So long as New England can maintain for her citizens a high standard of intelligence, of virtue, and national love, I have no misgivings as to the position she will occupy in the Republic. If her Senators can truly and worthily represent a people with such characteristics, they need never fear that their voice will be unheeded. Once New England cast exactly one-third of the votes in this branch of the National Legislature. Now she casts less than one-sixth of them, and yet she does not feel that she has been shorn of her strength or that her influence has departed or waned.

And right here, Mr. President, I want to say, when we are sometimes told that the six New England States, which cast 12 votes, have but a small proportion of the population of this great country, that there are six other States casting 12 votes in this body which have not half the population of New England, add two more to them and you will find that these eight other States casting 16 votes here without an aggregate population equal to the population of New England, and we have no complaint to make.

If indeed the field in which her enterprise was to be exerted were limited to the six sterile States which lie east of the great Empire State of New York, possibly she might have occasion to regard the admission of new States into the Union with jealous fear. But New England is doomed to no such isolation. Her opportunity and her effort, if limited at all, are to be circumscribed only by the boundaries of the Republic of which she is a part. New England feels that her best claim to renown is that she is and has been, and is and is to be, a part of that great nation which we call the United States. Every enlargement of national domain, every addition of States, every accumulation of national power adds to her strength and glory.

Why should New England be thought to fear or regret the admission of new States? Cast your eye along the parallels of latitude which stretch from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific shore. Study the characteristics of that marvelous civilization which has redeemed the land and subjugated the forces of nature along those parallels. Take note of the people who along those lengthened lines have builded cities, developed agriculture, penetrated the deep recesses of the earth, created a highway, yes, highways for the nation, established the institutions of education and religion, elevated and glorified mankind. Who are they? Are they not bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh? The blood of New England courses along every artery of national life. Put your finger on the pulse of enterprise as it beats in Walla Walla, or Seattle, or Tacoma, or Port Townsend, and you will feel the heart-throb of New England. Who are these men who to-day are asking of the Senate permission to enjoy the full privileges of American citizenship in the new State of Washington? True, they have gathered from many States; they have come even from foreign lands, from lands beyond the sea; a new people indeed, but how many of them can trace back their vigor and force to the ancestral cottage which stood on the New England hill-side, their patriotism to the village green, and their virtue to the New England church? The voice which I bring to them to-day from their ancestral States is, "Come in, and welcome."

And now that I am speaking, Mr. President, let me allude to another fear that occasionally I hear expressed for the future of New England. We are informed in tones of pity, tones in which I fancy at times I detect just a trace of exultation, that our prosperity is after all a little accidental, due to the early development and extension of our manufacturing enterprises; that we have really had a monopoly of manufacturing, but that the monopoly is now broken; that nature and transportation and the changed conditions of trade are all against us now, so that our pre-eminence in mechanical pursuits is fast passing away, and that the great centers of mechanical industry are henceforth to be found in the West and in the New South. I beg such sympathetic friends not to misunderstand New England.

She has no desire to seek her own advantage or progress at the expense of other portions of our common country. All she asks is a free field and fair competition. She noted long ago the tendencies of trade and yet does not despair, and whatever the future has in store she will not complain. If in the march of the years she finds other portions of the Republic are more favored, she will ask to rejoice with those who rejoice. She will still claim the privilege of enjoying her portion of the general welfare; and if danger assails the nation, she will still claim her privilege of meeting and sharing it with her more favored rivals.

Referring to my statement that New England long ago noted the tendencies of the times, now so kindly pressed upon our attention by mourning and sympathetic friends, let me quote from an address delivered by Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, in 1864, just as the war was closing. This is the quotation:

> In the production and diffusion of ideas must rest forever the secret of your strength to maintain your true position. When our national career shall begin anew the accelerated increase of wealth and of population, their necessary distribution and diffusion, will year by year constantly diminish the relative material strength of the Northeastern States. I exhort you, then, to put faith in ideas, in the orderly arrangement of knowledge, in the power to search out the hidden things of nature, in the practical application of the highest and largest truth to the wants and affairs of man's daily life. Your influence will tell then, with beneficent and ever-expanding power, on the destiny of the nation. Thereby you will live—the true conservatives of the civil state and of social life—"exempted from the wrongs of time and capable of perpetual renovation."

New England has no fears for the future. She has heard the cries, "Cotton is king," "Wheat is king," "Iron is king," and has heard them unmoved. She knows there is no real kingship in the United States but the sovereignty of ideas. If supplanted by more favored localities in the production of any article which she has made to supply the present wants or tastes of the people, she will try to anticipate their future wants and tastes and adapt her manufactures to the coming demand. If driven from the manufacture of staple products, she will endeavor to excel in works of art, and even if compelled to abandon the whole field of manufactures she will turn her attention once more to the wide seas and again wring subsistence and wealth from the waves. Whatever the problem of business life may be, New England will first think it out and then work it out.

So again we say to this new State, "Come in, and welcome!" We have seen twenty-five States added to the original thirteen without one jealous pang and without once thinking that our power or strength were departing. The more thickly the stars shall cluster and shine in that field of blue which so delights the eyes of every true American the more New England will rejoice.

Mr. DOLPH and Mr. VOORHEES addressed the Chair.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall yield to the Senator from Oregon in a moment. I do not rise to take the floor for the purpose of making any remarks, but really to ask the Senator from Oregon to allow me the opportunity to propose an amendment. I offer an amendment to come in at the close of the twenty-seventh section of the pending bill. I do not ask that it be read at this time. It is an amendment providing for an enabling act for the Territory of Montana. I ask that it be printed so that it can be inspected and discussed to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana offer an amendment?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is the language of an original bill which I introduced myself for the admission of Montana. This provides for an an enabling act—simply authorizes the people of Montana to proceed to form a State government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be received and ordered to be printed if there be no objection.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. I wish to give notice to the Senate that, having to leave the city very soon on private business, I shall at the conclusion of the morning hour to-morrow ask permission of the Senate to call up Order of Business No. 336, being Senate bill No. 839, to repeal chapter 27 of the acts of 1883, relating to civil service.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from Oregon yield for an executive session? If so, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, so that he may go on to-morrow morning.

Mr. DOLPH. Before the motion is made, I desire to say that my mind is entirely agreeable to the wish of the Senate. I am ready to proceed now to submit what I have to say on this bill, but of course I yield to the pleasure of the Senate. I should think it was rather early yet for an executive session; and I shall have no objection to yielding to that motion at any time during my remarks if it is the pleasure of the Senate that I should do so; or the motion can be submitted now, as far as I am concerned, if the Senate so prefer.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from Oregon having the floor on this bill, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

W. W. M'DOWELLS, ADMINISTRATOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order of that court dismissing the case of W. W. McDowells, administrator, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the affidavits and other papers in support of the bill (H. R. 3169) for the relief of J. F. Cisson.

Mr. MAYBURY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the Committee on Claims the papers in the matter of claim of the heirs of W. R. Burt.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DARGAN, for ten days.

To Mr. LINDSLEY, for one week from March 30, on account of important business.

To Mr. GROSVENOR, for three days, on account of important personal business.

To Mr. BUNNELL, for five days, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to extend in the RECORD his remarks on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

GRADUATES OF MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask leave to take from the House Calendar for consideration at this time the bill (S. 223) to regulate the promotion of graduates of the United States Military Academy.

Mr. BEACH. Do I understand that this bill is on the House Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] has so stated.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEACH. I shall have to object to its consideration, much as I regret to do so, for it is a bill in which I personally feel much interest.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin states that he rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Speaker, since I made some remarks last Thursday on the Post-Office appropriation bill certain newspaper correspondents in Washington have sent to their respective papers statements which not only place me in a false light before the country, but also reflect upon my integrity as a member of this House. I send to the Clerk's desk a paper called The Daily Northwestern, published at Oshkosh, Wis.; and I wish to have read the portions I have marked on pages 1 and 2.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rough on Richard—Severely criticised for his recent speech—Congressman GUENTHER taken to task at Washington for certain allusions to Germany and Germans—His support of Vilas.

Congressman GUENTHER'S speech on the Post-Office appropriation bill is provoking much hostile criticism. His remarks on German customs and life were received with profound surprise. As expected, he defended the Postmaster-General's opposition to the steamship subsidy. This has drawn a fire on him from the Pacific Mail people. The speech, especially parts reflecting on Germany and the Germans, will be translated and published in all the German papers in the United States, and Mr. GUENTHER is likely to receive rough treatment at their hands.

A Washington dispatch to the Sentinel says:

"It is said that Mr. GUENTHER'S speech to-day in defense of Postmaster-General Vilas was in fulfillment of a promise exacted from Mr. GUENTHER in return for his appointment upon that committee."

[Laughter.]

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Speaker, this latter charge reflects not only on my own integrity, but on that of the Speaker of this House and the Postmaster-General. I therefore feel called upon to offer a personal explanation.

As a matter of fact, I will state that I never intimated to anybody, either directly or indirectly, that I wished to be appointed a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I never approached the Speaker, nor did anybody in my interest, regarding appointment on any committee, but I left it to the judgment of the Speaker to assign me wherever he thought best. While I had my own preferences for certain committees, among which the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was not included, I left the matter entirely to the judgment of the Speaker, and resolved to perform my duty to the best of my ability wherever he might place me.

Up to about ten days ago I had not met the Postmaster-General during this session of Congress, nor indeed while he has been a member of the Cabinet, except once when I met him on the street and simply exchanged the compliments of the day with him. In saying what I did on the carrying of the foreign mails I acted consistently with my course in the Forty-eighth Congress when I voted against the Pacific Mail Steamship subsidy whenever a vote was taken on the question.

I did not consider it of any moment whether the Postmaster-General belonged to the Republican or the Democratic party. I am of the opinion that he did right, no matter what his politics were.

I am a Republican. I have been a Republican ever since I came to this country. I have never Greeleyized. [Laughter and applause.] I have never mugwumpized. [Renewed laughter and applause.] But while I have been a member of this House I have occasionally cast my vote against the majority of my party. But, Mr. Speaker, I never did so unless I honestly thought I was right. [Applause.]

Three months ago, Mr. Speaker, I declined to be a candidate for reelection, as I wished to devote my time to business pursuits. While I have been a member of this House I have tried to do my duty, at least as I understood it, to the best of my limited ability. While I undoubtedly have made mistakes, I hope that no gentleman with whom I have had the honor to be associated on this floor will even insinuate that my course during this time has been anything but honorable, upright, and just. I have never entered into a corrupt bargain with anybody. [Applause.]

As to the other charge, I will leave that to my German fellow-citizens to judge. At all times whenever I had a chance to do anything to further the interests of my German fellow-citizens not incompatible with my duties as a citizen of this Republic I have done so willingly, cheerfully, fearlessly, and at all times, and I shall always do so. If there is anybody in this country who takes a greater interest in the real welfare of those of our citizens whose cradle stood on the soil of the fatherland I wish to know him, so I can take him by the hand and call him my friend. [Applause.] When I alluded to "happy" Germany in a Pickwickian sense, I uttered the convictions, the honest convictions, of my heart, and by them I stand.

I love the German people, but I have no sympathy with those who have tyrannized over them, and who by the bayonet, the musket, and the gun have always stifled their attempts to gain political liberty. I love the common people of Germany, whose son I am.

I love the land where my father, my brothers, and sisters lie buried, and where my aged mother lives to-day.

But, sir, I would not exchange my proud title of American citizenship for all the titles, all the orders, all the wealth that the Emperor of Germany or his iron chancellor could bestow upon me. [Great applause all over the House.]

I came to this country, sir, to better my condition, the same as millions of my countrymen did; and, Mr. Speaker, when they shall learn why Mr. Kasson calls their former home "happy" Germany, they will smilingly shrug their shoulders and thank kind Providence that they live in "happy" Germany no more, but are citizens of a great, free, and prosperous Republic. [Prolonged applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRAGG. The bill I asked to take up and pass this morning was for the benefit of the cadets at West Point. I wish to know whether the gentleman who objected is Mr. BEACH, who represents that district?

Mr. BEACH. I will inform the gentleman from Wisconsin it was I who objected. I take as deep an interest in that bill as anybody on this floor. It concerns the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor, but I am compelled to object to it at this time.

Mr. MORRISON. I object to this, as it is out of order.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STRAIT, in accordance with previous consent, submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on the Public Lands on the bill (H. R. 147) to declare forfeited certain lands granted to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to dispense with the first morning hour for the call of committees for reference.

Mr. FINDLAY. I hope that motion will not prevail, as it is only right the committees should have leave to submit reports for reference.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable. It requires a two-thirds vote.

The motion was not agreed to.

SERVICE OF CIVIL AND CRIMINAL PROCESS.

Mr. BENNETT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2879) to authorize service of civil and criminal process by Territorial courts within military and Indian reservations and the Yellowstone Park; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS, ARKANSAS.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5910) to detach the counties of Howard, Little River, and Sevier from the western and add them to the eastern district of Arkansas; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGES ACROSS MISSOURI AND KANSAS RIVERS.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with favorable recommendations bills of the following titles; which were severally referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 5685) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Missouri River at the most accessible point in Saline City, or within 5 miles above or 5 miles below the same, in the county of Saline, in the State of Missouri;

A bill (H. R. 3519) authorizing the Interstate Rapid Transit Railway Company to build a bridge across the Kansas River;

A bill (H. R. 4569) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at a point to be selected either in the counties of Clay and Jackson, in the State of Missouri, or in the county of Clay or Platte, in said State, and the county of Wyandotte, in the State of Kansas, and to make the same a post-road; and

A bill (H. R. 5684) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at the most accessible point between the mouth of Femme Osage Creek and a point 2 miles above the City of Saint Charles, in the county of Saint Charles, in the State of Missouri.

PORT OF TRENTON, N. J.

Mr. O'FERRALL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1500) changing the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the port of Trenton, in said district; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS YELLOWSTONE RIVER.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 6358) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yellowstone River, in Montana; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. BYNUM, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5677) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Red Wing, Minn., to the opposite shore in the State of Wisconsin; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SCHUYLKILL RIVER AND EAST SIDE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. FINDLAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 2017) granting the right of way to the Schuylkill River and East Side Railroad Company through the arsenal and navy asylum grounds at Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PATRICK S. DOIG.

Mr. HOUK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1657) for the relief of Patrick S. Doig; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HOUK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back with an adverse recommendation bills with the following titles; which were severally ordered to be laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 4781) for the relief of George W. Dillow; and

A bill (H. R. 923) for the relief of Cudberth Stone.

Wood; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of standing and select committees is now completed. The hour for the consideration of bills under the rule begins at ten minutes past 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS, MARSHALS, COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6977) relating to the compensation and duties of United States marshals, attorneys, and commissioners, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair, and resumed the consideration of House bill 6977.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there being only about forty minutes left within which the present consideration of this bill must be concluded under the rules, and as I have been notified by some members who oppose the bill that they will not allow a vote to be taken in that time, I shall not undertake to press the bill to a vote to-day, but will permit the discussion to continue. I yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt in the time allotted to me to discuss this bill in detail; I can only allude to some of its most important provisions: First, those substituting for the fee system the salary system as to marshals and district attorneys; next, that other provision of the bill by virtue of which judges are to appoint as nearly as may be commissioners in every county or parish in the United States. The fee system, Mr. Chairman, is a failure. It has but one plea in its behalf, and that is that it has long been acquiesced in. Upon that plea it must stand condemned. It has had a thorough and a long trial; and I do not know any one who has examined thoroughly into its workings who does not condemn it.

I have made a study of this question for some years. I have talked to officials, clerks in the Department of Justice and clerks in the Treasury Department, whose business it has been to audit these accounts, and who have thus become thoroughly acquainted with the workings of the system; and I have yet to find one of them who does not condemn it, and say that it ought to be abolished. This is, I believe, the opinion of every law officer in the Departments whose duties have made him familiar with its workings. Attorney-General Devens eight years ago in his report recommended that it should be abolished and the salary system substituted. Attorney-General Brewster, in his report four years ago, recommended the same thing; and in subsequent reports, after examination thorough and exhaustive, North and South, East and West, into the workings of this system he was but confirmed in his conclusion and repeated his recommendation. In the State of Alabama there was the most disgraceful corruption; so in Pennsylvania; so in some of the Western States; so in Texas. All these things were shown by the agents of the Department of Justice sent out by Attorney-General Brewster.

Coming down in point of time, Attorney-General Garland is likewise against this system, and President Cleveland is against it. And I am glad that we are at last likely to have an opportunity in this House to discuss and pass upon this question upon its merits. I was against the system when the appointing power was Republican, I am against it when the appointing power is Democratic, because it is radically wrong in principle.

It was adopted and has been maintained because the system has worked comparatively well in most of the States; but there is no analogy whatever. The two cases differ first in this: In every State the territory within which a sheriff or similar officer may exercise his functions is limited. Generally to execute process he can go not farther than 20 or 30 miles. Generally he can make upon a single arrest not more than a few dollars—five or ten at most. Under the system necessarily prevailing in the United States courts a marshal generally has power to serve writs hundreds of miles away from the place to which they are returnable. And instead of being tempted by a little fee of two or three or five or ten dollars at most, the law allows him as much as $50 or $100 or $150, and sometimes $200 for a single arrest, without counting the fees for subpœnaing and bringing in witnesses.

Then, again, a sheriff holds his office for a fixed period. He can not be removed at will; and his jurisdiction being local, he is subject to the influence of a sound, healthful, public opinion brought to bear upon him there in that bailiwick or neighborhood for which he is elected and in which his duties are to be performed. But it is not so with a marshal. A marshal gets his authority from Washington, possibly thousands of miles away; and though he is subject to be removed at the discretion of the appointing power, yet he largely exercises his functions among those who are strangers to him, who reside at a distance from him, and to whom he feels in no wise responsible. Public opinion does not restrain him, but temptation allures him.

But it is said by those who object to this system that there will not be sufficient incentive for a marshal to perform his duties if he gets simply a salary. The very fact that he may be removed in an instant, without the allegation of any cause whatever—simply at the will of the President—when taken in connection with the fact that by his side are those who were his rivals in seeking the appointment and who are ready to report upon him if he shall be found wanting in the discharge of his duties is sufficient inducement, it seems to me, to secure the discharge of duty on the part of any marshal.

Mr. Chairman, the salary system will no doubt be welcomed by marshals and attorneys. Adopt it, and it will no longer be thought among the people every act of a marshal and every act of a district attorney is prompted by the hope of a fee. We will elevate the standing of these officials among the people. We will elevate the law itself in popular esteem, because every prosecution by a district attorney and every arrest by a marshal will be looked upon as the execution of the law in the spirit of the law and in the spirit of justice.

My time will permit me only to allude briefly to the subject of commissioners. The bill provides that every judge of the United States shall lay off the territory over which he presides, as nearly as may be, into as many districts as there are counties or parishes, and for each of these shall appoint one or more United States commissioners, who shall have jurisdiction only within the districts so laid off.

Under the present system we have many commissioners who have no other means of a livelihood than the fees of their office. This is possible, because they can issue processes to run for hundreds of miles, all over a judicial district. They are paid so much per diem for every day they are employed. They are thus tempted to provide business for every day in the year.

I make no charges, Mr. Chairman, against district attorneys or marshals or commissioners as a class. I know those holding these positions who are as honorable as any men in the land. But we can not be sure always under any administration of getting such men, and we must have laws that will not lead our officials into temptation if we wish to deliver the people from evil.

The first effect of this law will be that we shall no longer have commissioners whose living will depend upon the number of prisoners they try. No commissioner can find or make business enough in one county or one parish to sustain him. The next effect will be to save expense to the Government and annoyance and hardship to the people. We will no longer have men dragged hundreds of miles from their homes to preliminary trials before commissioners.

The result will be that this business will be put into the hands of men who have other means of making a livelihood, other business to depend upon.

And lastly, a commissioner appointed for a single county will be subject to a wholesome public opinion, which will not only incite him to a proper administration of the law, but will tend to restrain him from wrongdoing.

Mr. Chairman, local self-government is the very corner-stone of our free institutions. The love of it is the foundation of Anglo-Saxon liberty, and if we would strengthen the law we ought to give the administration of it as far as possible into the hands of the people. If you would have the laws of your country obeyed you must trust the people to enforce them.

Mr. GIBSON. I will now yield for fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the committee is in its main features like the bill reported by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice at the last Congress. That committee devoted many months of careful labor to this subject. The object was to fix salaries for United States attorneys and marshals in lieu of the present compensation by fees. The Department of Justice had investigated this subject for several years by means of special agents of that Department, and the Attorney-General had come to the conclusion that the fee system, as applied to United States marshals and district attorneys, was expensive and at the same time conducive to unnecessary and frivolous prosecutions.

The committee gave this subject, as I have already said, careful consideration. It went to the Department of Justice and took the views of the gentlemen there who had been accustomed to look over the accounts of marshals and district attorneys. It also took the views of the Treasury officials whose duty it was to investigate and audit the accounts of United States officials. This bill, therefore, is the joint product of the committee of the last Congress, as well as the committee of this, together with the Department of Justice and the Treasury Department.

At the first session of the last Congress it was adopted by this House nearly unanimously as an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill. The Senate refused to agree to the provisions of this bill at that time simply because it was legislation upon an appropriation bill; and for that reason it was finally rejected. At the second session of the last Congress the bill was again introduced and placed upon the Calendar; but owing to the rules which were then in force it could not be reached for consideration. It is now here for the careful deliberation and consideration of this body, and I hope the members of this House will give it that attention which its great importance demands.

It seems to me, sir, that there is not, and will not be, before Congress during this session a bill of more marked or practical importance to the people of the United States than the measure we are now considering. During the years past the powers of the Federal Government, exercised through the courts of the country, have been persistently and continuously abused by the Federal officials charged with the execution of judicial proceedings. That abuse has been encouraged and promoted by the fee system that has prevailed, whereby fees on the amount of business done were allowed and received by these officials of the Government. Our present system puts it in the power of certain persons to bring all of the judicial machinery of the Government of the United States into play for the purpose of enabling them to earn fees regardless of the fact as to whether or not offenses had been committed against the United States that justified such proceedings.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me a question just here?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. As I understand the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, it is to the effect that the purpose of this bill is to prevent in the future frivolous prosecutions. I will ask him if, in fixing the fees of the United States attorneys hereafter under this bill, the committee have not given the benefit of the abuses of which he speaks, by these illegal prosecutions, in making up the amount of the compensation to be paid as salary?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. That is true, for we had no other data upon which we could go.

Mr. SPRINGER. You refer now to fixing the salaries?

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Yes, sir. And a further question. I will ask the gentleman if he does not know it to be true that although in the State of Missouri, in the eastern district of that State, the salary of the United States district attorney is fixed at $4,000, as compared with the western district, where it is $3,000, whether the report of the Attorney-General does not show that there are more criminal and more civil cases in which the United States is a party tried by the United States attorney in the western district than in the eastern? I ask him, therefore, why is this difference in their salaries?

Mr. SPRINGER. I was coming to that after a while. It is a question that bears upon the merits of the case.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me I would like to ask him another question, so that he can answer both together.

Mr. SPRINGER. I must decline to yield for a further question, unless upon this particular point. I wish to dispose of one at a time.

It is not pretended that we can reach or enact a perfect bill at one session of Congress. We could scarcely hope that. It is true that in estimating these salaries the committee has been compelled to consider the business heretofore done; but it may turn out hereafter, after the passage of this bill, and under its operation, that there will be a great change in the business of the several districts of the country; and when that fact is developed it will be the duty of Congresses that come after us to equalize the salaries in proportion to the amount of business actually done. I repeat, we can not hope to do everything during this one session of Congress. There is no doubt that we will leave something for our successors to do in further perfecting the bill and in other respects. I can assure my friend from Missouri they will have plenty to do.

But, Mr. Chairman, at the last session of Congress the Attorney-General transmitted a communication to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to which I desire to ask the attention of members of this House. In a communication dated May 19, 1884, he says:

> The practice of compensating the United States marshals by fees is an expensive one. Examiners of the Department of Justice have been detailed to examine their accounts, and report that in order to make the maximum fee of the office $6,000 per annum, unscrupulous marshals, in some instances, through their deputies, have inaugurated frivolous prosecutions, outraging the rights of citizens, and involving the United States in unnecessary and excessive expenses. It is estimated—

Now I want to call the attention of gentlemen particularly to this statement—

> It is estimated in the Department of Justice that it costs the Government $10 expense for every dollar's emoluments of the marshal.

Consider this statement for a moment. Under the fee system the marshal starts out on a foraging expedition to run his maximum compensation up to $6,000 a year. What is the result to the Government? It results in an expenditure of $60,000 to enable him to accumulate his six-thousand-dollar fee.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly, on this point.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Has not the gentleman from Illinois, by fixing the compensation of United States marshals in this bill, rewarded those marshals who went out on the foraging expeditions to which he refers and punished those who attended to their legitimate business and did not go on such expeditions?

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope my friend from Missouri does not desire to draw me away from the subject before me. His question does not relate at all to the point I am now discussing. I stated before, and it has been stated by other gentlemen, that we had no other basis except the fees which had been collected in the past to guide us. All we can hope to do is to pass a bill which will approximately give proper fees, to be regulated in future. But let me call the attention of the committee to the subject I was about discussing.

I have stated that in order to enable the marshal to earn his maximum of $6,000 a year he involved the Government of the United States in an expenditure of $60,000; and this expenditure was incurred at the expense of the citizens of the United States, who are unnecessarily and needlessly prosecuted in order that the marshal may earn his fees. If I had time I would recite some of the instances that were brought out during the last Congress. I could point to the fact that in Texas, at one term of the United States court, the marshal brought to the court every voter in one county to appear in the United States court in the adjoining county. Every person over the age of twenty-one years was brought a distance of 40 miles by rail for the purpose of making the fees for the marshal, when the court which tried the case testified before the committee twenty witnesses would have been sufficient to establish every controverted point in the case.

In one county in Alabama it was proved before the committee that every male citizen of the county above the age of twenty-one, black and white, had been arrested and taken a great distance from his home for the purpose of swelling the emoluments of marshals and deputies.

Mr. ROGERS. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. Under what pretext was this done?

Mr. SPRINGER. It was done under no pretext that I know of except to swell the emoluments of the marshal. The charge was timber depredations. It was a great outrage upon the citizens. Many cases have been shown where persons have been taken 150 miles from their homes, and then discharged without money, and were compelled to walk home.

This system has been going on for years. The Department of Justice investigated it. The committee of this House in the last Congress investigated it. And the only conclusion at which the Department and the committee could arrive was that the fee system was at the bottom of the evil, and that that system should be eradicated. The committee have, therefore, endeavored to substitute for fees the salaries provided in this bill.

The salaries as provided in this bill will result in a great economy to the Government, and if enacted into law they will result in an improvement in the public service and a more efficient administration of justice. They will also put a stop to the hundreds and thousands of frivolous cases that are tried before commissioners and United States courts all over the country for the sole purpose of swelling the emoluments of the Government officials.

It was stated in the last Congress when the appropriation bill for this service was before the House that a sufficient sum had been voted to pay those expenses. But I pointed out the fact then that there would be a large deficiency required before the year was over. That prediction was verified, for before the last Congress adjourned we were compelled to make a large appropriation for deficiencies, and even at this session the Committee on Appropriations in its urgent deficiency bill has included deficiencies of $50,000 for jurors and $135,000 for the payment of witnesses.

Now I want to say to the committee that Congress has no power to limit the expenses that will be incurred under existing law in the administration of justice. You can not limit these expenses. They are authorized by law. Whenever a citizen comes before a commissioner and makes a complaint and a warrant is issued the expenses begin to accrue. There is no means of checking this vast drain upon the public Treasury, this outrageous oppression upon the citizen, except by departing from the old system of fees and returning to the system of salaries as provided in this bill.

As to whether these salaries are correctly fixed or not, I do not pretend to claim that the schedule of fees here is perfect. It is a mere approximation to what ought to be done; and I hope in the further consideration of this bill we will hear the views of gentlemen coming from different localities as to the amount of business to be done and the salaries required.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. However much it is to be regretted that a bill of this importance, correcting so many evils and doing so much good, could not have been passed under the rules during this hour for the consideration of bills, it only remains for us who are trying to get this law passed to recognize the fact and prepare ourselves for the future consideration of the bill when it is reached in its regular order. I trust, however, that this discussion may accomplish the good of turning the attention of the House to the evils that this bill seeks to correct, and that members may inform themselves of its provisions and the abuses of the present system, so that when the bill does come up again it may receive a full, a fair, and a frank consideration; and that when that time comes the selfish aims and desires of no single member will be allowed to stand in the path of the accomplishment of this great object.

I desire now to answer the question which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has so persistently put—why the fees should be larger in some districts than in others, when it appears by the reports of the Attorney-General that more has been earned in the district where the fees allowed by this bill are smaller than in others. I will simply say to the gentleman that the object of this bill is to cover all fees, civil as well as criminal, and that the reports of the Attorney-General only cover those fees which are recovered from the United States and are payable by the United States; whereas the largest amount, or the largest percentage, of the remuneration of the district attorneys in the large cities comes from the defendants in suits, and do not appear upon the record. For instance, in the southern district of New York, where I think the record shows only some ten or twelve thousand dollars payable to the United States Government, the district-attorney, Mr. Bliss, testifies that he has received as much as $36,000 in a single year.

The way that came to pass was this: The United States Government brought its suits against individuals for violation of the revenue laws in some form and when judgment was recovered a certain fee was charged and payable to the United States and that appeared upon the record, but, in addition, the court would allow to the district attorney from one thousand to two or three thousand dollars as an additional fee to be paid by the defendants, and that did not appear upon the record. Now in this bill the fee of the district attorney of the southern district of New York is fixed at $8,000; whereas under the present law he has received, as I have stated, as high as $36,000 a year. A like condition of affairs existed in the State of Missouri about which the gentleman [Mr. WARNER] has made several inquiries here.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question now?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] will only put his question and not make a speech, I will yield.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman inform the House of any provision of law that authorized the taxation of such extra fees as he has described?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir; the common law of the country and the practice of the courts allow them.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. The highest fee——

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further in the few minutes that I have left. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] will have an opportunity to make his explanation in his own time.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I simply want to say that there is no such law.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no law, but it is the universal practice.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. It is authorized by the common law and the common practice of the courts.

Now, in the city of Saint Louis, where also they have imports and the collection of customs duties, various suits have of course arisen out of that business, and the fees of the United States district attorney there are much larger in that district, the eastern district of Missouri, than they are in the western district, although they do not appear upon the record; and it is so in many of the cities throughout the country. For that reason, where the fees in some of the districts in which there are large commercial cities appear small, they are really very large. There is another thing that I want to say to the House. Many members are under a misapprehension as to the proposed salaries. That is not their fault, nor is it the fault of the committee, for if they could take time to examine the bill they would find that the salaries provided in it are not the salaries in the schedule to which the Attorney-General refers. The proposed salaries are printed with the report.

The difference in the figures arises from the fact that the bill referred to the Attorney-General for his suggestions fixed those salaries, but by the advice of the Attorney-General many of them were raised. That is how the discrepancy has occurred between the figures in the report and the figures in the bill. Of course, in undertaking to print the report of the Attorney-General and the schedule to which it refers, the committee did not alter the figures as they were originally presented in the schedule.

Mr. CLARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARDY. Why have you not undertaken to fix the compensation of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that we have not undertaken to fix the compensation of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States for the reason that no bill referred to us touched it. We knew very well that we had a great and difficult subject to deal with, and we did not want to load down this bill in any way that could be avoided. We know the difficulty of bringing about reforms. I see men here on the Democratic side and men on the Republican side who have been shouting almost against the outrages which we seek to abolish, yet who stand here now ready to strangle this bill because there is not enough "boodle" in it for their districts. I know the difficulty of bringing about reforms. I know the selfishness of men in this House and the selfishness of men out of it. I know that we have to confront these difficulties at every step we take. We are asked by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] why it is that in fixing these salaries we take into consideration the wrongs that these officers have perpetrated in the past. We do it because we have found it necessary to get definite data on which to proceed, and we could do that only by ascertaining and considering to some extent the amount of business heretofore done in the different districts. It was necessary for us to have some foundation on which to prepare the bill. In addition to that, the House will find that in every solitary case we have undertaken to fix these salaries not so much by the amount of business that has been done as, according to our judgment, of the reasonable compensation to which an honest and competent officer is entitled.

In some cases we have raised the salaries of these officers above the amount that they have received from their fees for the simple reason that the fees they had received were not sufficient to insure to the Government the services of good officers. We thought that honest and competent officers were entitled to a fair compensation for their services, and we undertook to pay them accordingly. You can not get a competent district attorney unless you pay him a reasonable salary, a salary commensurate with his talent. You can not induce a good lawyer to give his attention to this sort of business unless you pay him a respectable compensation. Nor can you secure the services of an efficient marshal unless you pay him a fair salary. Therefore, in some cases, where the fees have aggregated a smaller amount than was in our opinion sufficient, we have undertaken to raise the salaries above that amount.

But suppose there are some inequalities in this bill. Suppose some man may receive a few dollars less than what he ought to get. Suppose some man may have been able heretofore to make more. These persons have gone into these offices not entirely for the fees or the compensation, but in some measure for the honor, the political value attaching to the positions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice under this order has expired. The Committee of the Whole will therefore rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6977) relating to the compensation and duties of United States attorneys, marshals, and commissioners, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CLASSIFICATION AND COMPENSATION OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Mr. COX (when the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service was called) said: I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6855) to secure an equitable classification and compensation of certain officers of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 6855.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President is authorized to employ three persons not in the public service of the United States, and to designate two additional persons who are officers in such service at Washington, not more than three of whom shall be adherents of the same political party, which five persons shall constitute a commission for the purposes of this act; and the President may fill any vacancy therein.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of said commissioners to prepare and submit to the President a report, or several reports in case of a difference of opinion among the commissioners, for transmission to Congress by him on or before the first day of the next regular session of Congress, upon the proper classification, compensation, and number of officials to be employed, and showing the number employed at the date of the report, and their salaries and compensation, respectively, in and under each of the several Departments, separate offices, and commissions in the executive civil service at Washington. Such report or reports shall contain one or more arrangements of such officials into appropriate classes, stating the salary or compensation proposed for those of each class, and give the reasons upon which the recommendation for such classifications, salaries, and compensations, respectively, are based.

SEC. 3. That such classification shall not extend to officers confirmed by the Senate, nor to laborers or other persons who are neither appointed to nor perform clerical duties, but it shall include all persons who perform duties of the kind now performed by those embraced in any existing classification; and the classifications shall be equally comprehensive, and the compensation of those embraced in them shall, so far as practicable, be uniform, in the several Departments and offices, for doing work of the same kind.

SEC. 4. That the report or reports shall also set forth the practice as to substitutes, furloughs, and leaves of absence in such service, and in what respect, if any, such practice may be improved; and whether with advantage, and upon what conditions, a clerical force may be provided the members of which shall serve from time to time in different Departments and offices, as the exigencies of the public business may require.

SEC. 5. That the members of such commission who are not in the public service, and a secretary they are hereby empowered to appoint, shall be paid for their services and expenses such sums, respectively, as the President may approve, out of any money which may be appropriated for such purpose.

SEC. 6. That the heads of the Departments, offices, and commissions herein referred to shall allow such commissioners all reasonable facilities, and give them the proper information needed in the discharge of their duties hereunder, and may detail from their several Departments such persons to perform clerical work in connection with the duties of such commissioners as may be necessary.

SEC. 7. That the sum of $8,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet the compensation and expenses of said commissioners and secretary as herein provided.

Mr. COX. I ask that the report of the committee on this subject be read.

The report (by Mr. COX) was read, as follows:

The Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6855) to secure an equitable classification and compensation of certain officers of the United States, beg leave to submit the following report:

The committee have had this bill under consideration, and find that the present classifications of the various departmental clerks of the Government are based upon the salaries paid; that the salaries paid are not the same in the different Departments for the same kind of work, and frequently there is a wide difference in the salaries paid for the same class of work in the same Department. This, of course, should be remedied as far as possible. All compensation should be uniform in the several Departments and offices for doing work of the same kind.

The clerks in the several Departments were first classified in 1818, and the work of the Departments continued under such classification up to 1853, with minor changes in 1837.

In 1851 the Senate adopted a resolution directing the several heads of the Departments to report to the next session of Congress some plan for classifying the clerks in their Departments, for apportioning their salaries according to their services, and for equalizing the salaries of the clerks of the same grade in each of the Departments; and also some plan to provide for a fair and impartial examination of the qualifications of clerks, and for promoting them from one grade to another upon a due regard to qualifications and services.

In reply to this, the several heads of Departments submitted reports, which did not harmonize, so the act passed upon them did not secure that uniformity in the several Departments as it is hoped will be attained by this bill.

By the act of 3d March, 1853, the clerks were arranged into four classes, whose annual salaries were to be $900, $1,200, $1,500, and $1,800.

This act was amended in 1854, when the classes were arranged with the following salaries: Class 1 was fixed at $1,200 per annum; class 2, $1,400; class 3, $1,600; class 4, $1,800. Since then there has been no material change in the classification, notwithstanding the great augmentation of the civil-service employés.

It is difficult to account for this omission; and it is submitted that if the public affairs are to be conducted on a business basis, such a classification as is contemplated by this bill should not be longer delayed.

The present bill is more comprehensive and complete in its provisions than any similar measure heretofore presented. It not only embraces the hitherto classified service, but contemplates an investigation and report upon the employment of nearly all of the Government employés at Washington. It seeks to discover what the defects in the service are, and to secure some recommendation based upon careful inquiry for their correction.

One of the chief abuses believed to exist under the present system is the inequality of salaries paid for performing the same character of work. Another is the furlough and substitute system, which they are informed is most difficult to regulate. This bill contemplates the employment of supernumerary clerks, who shall be at the disposal of the different Departments to fill temporary vacancies by absenteeism from any cause, and who can be utilized to relieve any Department from an unusual stress of work. A similar class is already provided for in the letter-delivery system, and proves very effective. A recommendation for a similar class of clerks is made by the Secretary of State for the consular service.

There is another important object which will be accomplished by a proper classification and arrangement of the clerical force of the Government. It is this: Instead of Congress making an appropriation in gross for the employés of a Department of whose compensation they are ignorant, it would be enabled to provide so many clerks in class 1, 2, 3, &c., and could approximately ascertain the necessity for the appropriations it is making, and restrict a discretion on the part of a departmental officer, which has heretofore, in some instances, been abused.

The composition of the commission is thought to be most judicious. Three of them are selected from private life, and are, therefore, free from any predilections arising from employment in the Departments, while the two selected from the Departments will contribute the experience arising from the practical details of their office. This commission is to make its report to the President in time for its transmission to Congress at the beginning of the next session. In order that it should be thorough, comprehensive, and complete time and great care will be indispensable for its preparation. Hence the delay is believed necessary. The committee deem it proper to add that the labor incident to such an investigation as they think should be made preparatory to a new classification of the public service will be so great and of such a character that it is impracticable and inexpedient for it to be undertaken by any committee of Congress. Neither should Congress act upon the reports of the heads of Departments alone, for one of the prime objects is to secure uniformity in all the Departments, which was not done by the act of 1853, the reason for which is apparent.

This bill also contemplates an investigation and report upon some uniform plan for promotions in the service. It is known that promotions have heretofore sometimes been made on account of personal favoritism or political influence, and the consequence is that the clerks drawing a greatly inferior salary are in some instances performing the same duties as those who are drawing much larger salaries. Merit and skill, clear heads, and sound discretion and knowledge of the public business are not always titles to promotion.

It is believed that when all the facts are laid before Congress which can be brought to light by this investigation by a commission appointed by the President Congress can and will inaugurate such reforms as will greatly benefit the public service.

The committee is of the opinion that great good can be accomplished under the provisions of this bill, and therefore reports it to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Before the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX] proceeds with his remarks I would like to ask him why his committee has not reported back the bill for this identical purpose which I introduced early in this session?

Mr. COX. The bill to which the gentleman alludes, and which has been referred to a subcommittee, is not so comprehensive as this bill.

Mr. COX addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN (before Mr. COX had concluded his remarks) said: The hour for the consideration of bills under the rule has expired, and the Committee of the Whole will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6855) to secure equitable classification and compensation of certain officers of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the debate begins the Chair will announce that according to the account kept by the Clerk there remain one hundred and thirty-seven minutes for general debate, of which one hour and twenty minutes belong to the right and seventeen minutes to the left, and out of that time five minutes belong to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURROWS. That is right.

Mr. J. M. TAYLOR addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR (when the hammer fell) said: Mr. Chairman, are there not ten minutes more which I may occupy?

The CHAIRMAN. As the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has but fifty minutes reserved, and there is an hour remaining for his side, there are ten minutes more on that side.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. I ask to be recognized for those ten minutes, and will reserve the time.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not my purpose, sir, in this debate to enter into any history of the postal service. We have heard during the general debate much that has been instructive and entertaining. I propose simply to address myself to two features of this bill, and at the same time to give my hearty indorsement to the general paragraphs of the bill. It was my distinction to serve upon the subcommittee with the honorable chairman of the general committee [Mr. BLOUNT], and it has been my experience that when you can secure wise and satisfactory legislation in committee valuable time is lost on the part of any one in the discussion of the measure when it comes before the House.

Representing, as I do in part, a million of people, with their enterprises depending largely upon postal facilities, I am glad to say that during my years of service in this House no such appropriation bill has been presented for its consideration. It meets my hearty and most generous approval. Heretofore on bills of this character the time of the House has been largely occupied because the rules admitted of legislation being placed on general appropriation bills. The great and important postal legislation which has been adopted within the last few years formed a part of general appropriation bills. The 2-cent postage provision, the ounce-weight provision, the reduction of postage on second-class matter from 2 cents to 1 cent a pound—in fact all the great advances we have made toward cheap postage have become law through their incorporation in general appropriation bills. This bill comes to us to-day in another form. It comes simply as a skeleton bill carrying no legislation, but simply appropriating the amounts necessary to conduct the business of the Department during the next fiscal year.

Heretofore we have had at each session of Congress a struggle for each fiscal year's appropriation, because the Committee on Appropriations failed to submit to the House a bill covering the full requirements of the service. I do not think I mistake when I make the declaration that at the first and second sessions of the Forty-eighth Congress we built up in the body of the House the general appropriation bill to meet the requirements of the service, the bill having been increased at each of those sessions almost $3,000,000 above the amount reported by the committee.

Therefore I say that in my brief discussion of this measure I shall advert to but two paragraphs or propositions contained in the bill—the only two features to which there seemed to be any exception in the committee, and I presume the only two features which will meet with opposition in the discussions in this House. The first has reference to the foreign-mail service. I am not going into either an offensive or defensive declaration in regard to the Postmaster-General. His record is made up. It is known to the House and to the country. It has been commented on in this House by my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], whose utterances I wholly approve. Therefore it is unnecessary for me in this debate to repeat them. The issue with reference to the foreign-mail service is simply this: While the committee report $375,000 as necessary for this branch of the service it is believed by some that it will require $50,000 more, making $425,000, in order that the Postmaster-General may go to the limit of the law for the payment of postage to American steamers, ocean and inland.

From conversation with the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOUNT] I am of opinion that he has received additional information since the committee reported the bill which will show that the sum proposed to be appropriated ($375,000) will be amply sufficient. Should this supposition be correct, that controversy will be eliminated from the discussion; and the only remaining question will be whether the sum total of appropriation given in the bill is sufficient to pay the postal clerks their full salaries as allowed by statute.

I am of the opinion, in accordance with the statement of my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], that there should be added to the bill an additional appropriation of $90,000. It is not a question as to whether the service can be performed by the Postmaster-General with the amount now allowed for classes 4 and 5. We know it can be performed and is being performed to-day; but we know the further fact that the appropriation for the current fiscal year is not the maximum amount which would allow the Postmaster-General to pay these two classes of clerks the full compensation which the statute designated they should receive.

The action of the Postmaster-General seems to be based upon a declaration made during the debate in this House when this subject was under consideration. An inquiry was made whether the additional appropriation was intended to increase the compensation of these classes of clerks? The gentleman having that paragraph in charge a year ago, in reply to that inquiry seems to have made the statement it did not make any such increase. Thereupon the Postmaster-General has taken the ground that he is not authorized under the appropriation bill to pay these subordinate officers the full allowance of the law.

As the Postmaster-General is on record in reference to the foreign-mail service, so he is upon record in reference to the compensation of these postal clerks.

But the actual issue in the bill is whether, carrying out the spirit of the preceding Congress, carrying out the spirit, word, and meaning of the law itself, whether in this bill making appropriations for the next fiscal year we should not emphatically, in debate and by vote in this House, appropriate in the bill itself a sufficient amount to allow the Postmaster-General to pay these men the full compensation which the statutes provide they should receive for their services.

They are a hard-working subordinate force of the Government. In 1872 you fixed their compensation at $1,200 and $1,400 per annum. You appropriated that amount last year. The only direct issue coming from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the only direct issue in this House, is whether this appropriation should not be increased sufficiently so the Postmaster-General can give this subordinate force the full allowance of the law. When we come to the five-minute debate perhaps this point can be submitted to the House with more directness.

I have only, Mr. Chairman, to repeat my hearty and sincere indorsement of this bill with the exception of the two points which I have indicated. I believe it is the best Post-Office appropriation bill that ever came into the House during my term of service in this body.

I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates $375,000 for transportation of foreign mails. Of this sum about $315,000 will be required for incidentals and transportation of our transatlantic mails by foreign steamers. About $60,000 will remain for the American steamships which run to the countries of this continent, to Australia, and China, and Japan.

Will this afford just and reasonable compensation to our American steamships? This, and not whether we shall "subsidize" "grasping corporations having nothing but selfish ends at heart," as might be supposed from appeals made to prejudices, is the question before us. In justice to the intelligence of this House, I ask gentlemen to consider the subject with the candor which its importance demands.

I do not ask that this Government should imitate the governments of Europe in granting large subsidies to encourage the establishment and maintenance of steamship lines, however wise it might be to adopt a policy which has aided in giving them control of the routes of foreign commerce. The recital of their annual grants for this purpose is almost startling. Since 1840 Great Britain has expended $200,000,000 in subsidies to her steamship lines. Last year she paid them three and a quarter millions, a million and a quarter more than the receipts for postage. France paid hers still more; Italy two millions; Spain one million. Germany is to pay hers the coming year one million.

Against England's three and a quarter millions the United States proposes to pay $375,000 the coming year. But while England pays over three millions of her postal compensation to British vessels, we propose to pay only $60,000 of this sum to American steamships and $300,000 to British and other foreign steamships.

But it is claimed that this apparent discrimination against American steamships arises from the fact that the foreign steamships perform much more service, the rate of pay for service to American steamships being sea and inland postage, and to foreign steamships only the sea postage.

But on what basis is this service determined? How comes it, for example, that our Post-Office Department last year paid 38 cents per mile to the British Cunard and White Star lines for carrying our outward transatlantic mails, and only 4 cents per mile—to be increased, it is claimed, by this bill, to 8 cents—on the average to American steamships for carrying our outward mails to Central and South America, and China and Japan and the Australian colonies?

The answer of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is that our Post-Office Department and our laws base compensation solely on the number of letters and papers carried, and make no account of the number of miles traveled in performing the service. Thus, as the foreign lines carry the large transatlantic mails, their compensation is abundant on the basis of weight. But inasmuch as the American lines carry the small mails sent to Central and South America, and China and Japan and the Australian colonies, the compensation to them is only one-fifth what it is to the British vessels for the same number of miles of service.

I ask gentlemen to notice the practical workings of this basis. The British Cunard line was last year paid by our Post-Office Department $54,147 for forty-six trips of 3,000 miles each, or an average of $1,177 per trip, or 38 cents per mile for carrying our outward mails; and this was called fair mail pay. The same Post-Office Department offered the Brazilian steamship line $4,210 or $324 per trip of 5,500 miles, or 6 cents per mile one way for transporting our South American mails; and if inland as well as sea postage had been offered the compensation would have been $5,791, or 8 cents per mile.

I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] if he thinks it just to pay a British Cunarder $1,177 for mail service for a trip of 3,000 miles, and a steamer of the American Brazilian line only $5,791 for a trip of 5,500 miles?

Again, the Post-Office Department paid last year the American line to China and Japan only $3,500, or $290 per outward trip of 6,500 miles; or 3½ cents per mile (to be increased, it is claimed, to 8 cents per mile by this bill), and only $1,392, or $31 per outward trip of 3,500 miles, or 1¼ cents per mile, to be increased to 3¾ cents per mile by the allowance of sea and inland postage, to the Venezuela line; and at the same time paid the British White Star line $1,103 per trip of 3,000 miles.

I ask gentlemen again, if it is just to our steamers to adopt a basis of compensation which works such results? In our stage-coach mail service, in our steamboat mail service, in our mail service by coastwise steamers, the length of route and frequency of service, in other words, the miles traveled determine the compensation. Why should it not also be basis in determining the compensation for mail service to American steamships in the foreign service? It makes little difference in cost to a steamship whether it carries twenty or two hundred sacks of mail. The distance traveled is practically the only element of cost. Why should it not be the basis of compensation?

An amendment changing the basis of compensation for mail service by American steamships can not be made to this bill, but the House will be called to consider one when the bill to compel American steamships shall come up.

It is said that it is the duty of the Government to avail itself of the cheapest conveyance for its mails even if we have to give the service to foreign vessels. I have no doubt that Great Britain would gratuitously carry all our mails by way of Liverpool to South America, Australia, and Eastern countries if we would only withdraw our steamship lines directly connecting our ports with the ports of these countries, and that she would consider it a good bargain for herself in the advantage it would be to British trade and British naval supremacy. But would it be a wise or safe arrangement for the United States?

Mr. Chairman, there is another test of the inadequacy and injustice of our present mail pay to American steamers in the foreign trade, and that is a comparison of the amount paid them with that paid our coastwise steamers. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] calls attention to the fact that the Post-Office Department last year paid almost 16 cents per mile for steamboat service and 4 cents per mile (allowing mileage only one way) for American steamship mail-service, and that the increase allowed by this bill will raise it to 8 cents per mile. Even this comparison shows that the Department thought that 16 cents per mile on the average was no more than fair compensation for transportation of our mails by steamers when a large part of this service is on inland rivers which require inexpensive boats and involve none of the hardships and perils of the ocean.

But my friend from Missouri must see that the comparison should not be made with service by river steamers, many of them mere skiffs, but with service by such coastwise steamers as navigate the ocean and the larger rivers. I find that the Post-Office Department paid for steamboat mail service in the fourth contract section, comprising the coast and Mississippi River States of Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, California, Washington Territory, and Alaska, 23 cents per mile traveled, and for strictly coast service from 20 cents to 53 cents per mile, and no one rises here or elsewhere to charge that such compensation is "subsidy," or to attempt to prove, by comparison with the freight or parcels charges of the steamers performing the service, that the amount paid is the exaction of Eastern Shylocks.

Let me refer to specific illustrations of the discrimination made against American steamships which are endeavoring to carry our flag and products to foreign ports, some of which have been already cited in the able speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

The Post-Office Department paid last year the American coastwise steamers which convey our mails between Tampa and Key West $23,600, a distance of 246 miles, with two trips each week, and a total mileage both ways of 52,000 miles, or 48 cents per mile. This was what is called fair mail-pay.

But the same Department would consent to pay only $10,215 to the American steamship line running to China and Japan, a distance of 6,000 miles, and making a mileage of 109,620 miles one way, or 10½ cents per mile one way. And when the Forty-eighth Congress voted an amount which would have enabled the Postmaster-General to pay this line $40,000, that officer refused to execute the law; and gentlemen here commend him for his refusal.

The Post-Office Department last year properly paid the steamers running between Norfolk and Baltimore, a distance of 200 miles, the sum of $18,000 for mail service, but really more for commercial purposes, as there is mail service by rail. But the Postmaster-General informs us that he can not consider commercial advantages in arranging and paying for our foreign-mail service.

The Post-Office Department last year paid an American coastwise steamer line $29,700 for carrying our mail from Port Townsend to Tacoma, the weight of mail having nothing to do with the determination of the compensation. As the distance traveled both ways was 56,183 miles, the compensation was 53 cents per mile. This is accepted without question by anyone as fair mail-pay.

The Postmaster-General, on page 42 of his last report, states that last year $1,393 was paid to the American steamships running between New York and Venezuela, and sailing 104,244 miles one way, but recommended that $3,942, or 3½ cents per mile (sea and inland postage), be paid for this service during the next fiscal year, and adds that this will be "abundant compensation" for the service. And distinguished gentlemen on this floor not only concur in this opinion, but intimate that those who think that such compensation ought to be increased are aiding and abetting selfish and improper raids on the Treasury.

In extenuation of this course toward American steamships it has been argued here that many of our lines receive generous compensation from other governments for mail service, and therefore that this fact should be considered in determining our own payment. It is true that in many cases South or Central American Governments pay our steamships for carrying their mails on the inward trips, while we pay for the outward trips. But because Brazil, for example, pays our Brazilian line $108,000 to carry her mails on the inward trips of the steamers of that line to the United States, does this absolve us from making a just payment for the transportation of our own mails on the outward trips? To my mind the statement of the fact that Brazil regards direct mail and commercial communication with the United States so important that she is willing to pay $108,000 to American steamships to carry her mails to this country, only serves to put to shame our Government's course in attempting to compel the same American steamships to carry our mails to Brazil for less than $10,000. Is there not reason to fear that Brazil, New Zealand, and other countries, which are liberally paying American steamships for mail service on the inward trips of American steamship lines, will soon say that if the United States is not interested in maintaining postal and commercial communication with them they will turn elsewhere!

It is difficult for me to understand by what process of reasoning any one can bring himself to the conclusion that 53⅓ cents per mile both ways is fair compensation for mail service to an American steamship in the coastwise trade, while the moment that same steamship passes into the foreign trade from 4 to 8 cents per mile is regarded as adequate compensation, and 20 cents per mile both ways or 40 cents per mile one way is regarded as a "subsidy" to be frowned upon. It ought to be clear that when such disproportionate results are reached the basis of weight of mail by which compensation for mail service to American steamships in the foreign trade, without regard to length of route, is determined, is improper and unjust. Practically, length of route alone determines compensation for mail service by steamers in the coastwise trade which have no foreign competition.

Why this just basis of compensation should be set aside in compensating the American steamships which enter the foreign trade in competition with the heavily subsidized lines of Great Britain, is what no one of those who have insisted that our compensation to the latter is "adequate," has undertaken to explain. Without intending it, those who defeat every attempt to right this grievous wrong, are doing much to drive our flag from the ocean and strengthen British maritime supremacy. In the sharp struggle which our steam marine in the foreign trade is making to hold present routes of traffic on this continent and to extend them to countries of South America with which we have no direct steam communication, a few thousand dollars as mail compensation may in many cases prove the turning point. And more valuable often than pecuniary aid the knowledge that the country recognizes the importance of their work and is eager to do them justice would go far to inspire courage and hope for the future.

POSTAL STEAMSHIP APPROPRIATION OF 1885.

Mr. Chairman, criticism has been made in this debate on the provision in the postal appropriation act, passed by the last Congress, appropriating $400,000 for mail service by American steamships. It has been repeatedly affirmed that it was a "wicked subsidy" scheme, and that the Postmaster-General has deserved well of the country in his refusal to take a single step to carry it out.

The law referred to was designed to give the Postmaster-General authority and means to increase the compensation of existing American steamship lines, and to encourage the establishment of new lines. The only restriction put upon his discretion in the use of the appropriation was, first, that not more than 50 cents per mile traveled should be paid—this limitation being inserted out of abundant caution, no one expecting that any line except some very short ones would receive the maximum amount; second, that proposals should be invited for carrying the mail on such routes as the Postmaster-General thought proper, with the usual right to limit or to reject all bids if the terms proposed were not regarded favorable, and third, that if any proposal was accepted it should be that of the lowest bidder.

I can speak for myself as an advocate of the measure, that I expected, and I know others expected, that the Postmaster-General would examine the question as to what amount would be a fair compensation to American lines, and that, taking the compensation paid to the Cunard line for mail service by our Government as a basis, he would reach the conclusion that American lines, with a mileage both ways of about 1,400,000 miles, ought to have on the average about 20 cents per mile both ways or 40 cents one way, and that in framing his advertisements for the important routes he would insert a clause to the effect that no bids above this sum would be accepted. Indeed, it is well understood that the American lines were generally ready to accept this as a maximum basis, and it is possible that for the two routes on which there were competing lines there might have been bids somewhat lower.

This would have required about $275,000, of which about $40,000 would have been paid to the China and Japan line, $40,000 to the Australian line, $25,000 to the Aspinwall line, $25,000 to the Panama line, $25,000 to the Mexican line, $35,000 to the Venezuelan line, $25,000 to the Cuban line, $40,000 to the Brazilian line, $10,000 to the Hayti line, and the balance of the $275,000 to a few lines of little importance. All of these sums, I admit, cover very low compensation, but they would have been accepted. The $125,000 remaining of the appropriation would have secured the extension of the Brazilian line to Buenos Ayres, Montevideo, and some other important South American points.

These amounts would have not been "subsidies" in the offensive meaning which attaches to that word, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] assumes, but simply reasonable compensation to American lines for mail service. I have little doubt that if the act of 1885 had been carried out in this spirit—in the spirit which animated the great body of its supporters in passing it—that we should have greatly encouraged and strengthened existing American steamship lines, and paved the way for a gradual increase of lines which would give American producers and American merchants direct postal and commercial communication with the countries of this continent to which they must look for markets.

Instead of carrying out this law in the spirit in which Congress enacted it, the Postmaster-General declined to take a single step to execute it for reasons which seem to me to be utterly untenable. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has discussed these excuses in his speech on this bill, I will not occupy the time of the committee in considering them.

THE COMPULSORY LAW.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] have referred approvingly to the fact that the Postal Committee have reported a bill to re-enact the law compelling American steamship lines to carry our mails at such rates as the Postmaster-General may offer, not, however, to exceed the sea and inland postage, and have intimated that the repeal of that act in 1884 was accomplished in an improper manner and for an improper object.

The facts relating to the repeal of this unwise and unjust compulsory law are simply these: In the investigation made into the shipping question in 1882 by the joint select committee appointed by the Forty-seventh Congress the attention of the committee was called to this law and the practical injustice of its operation under existing conditions.

It was ascertained that it was enacted in 1864 to meet a difficulty with the Vanderbilt steamship line, which then was the main reliance of the country for mail communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States. The Vanderbilt line was then receiving $69,000 for the transportation of our mails, a compensation admitted to be most generous by all parties. It was stated to Congress that there was no question about compensation. Under these circumstances the act worked no injustice to any one. At that time, too, the sea and inland postage, which formed the basis of compensation to the few other steamship lines that we possessed, was much larger than it has been since the countries to which our lines run were admitted to the Postal Union.

Under these circumstances the committee, composed of such gentlemen as Senator VEST, Congressman Cox (now minister to Turkey), and Congressman McLane (now minister to France), unanimously recommended to Congress that the compulsory law should be repealed, and better compensation allowed to American steamships for mail service. The subject was not reached for action by the Forty-seventh Congress.

In the Forty-eighth Congress bills were unanimously reported by the Commerce Committee of the Senate and the Shipping Committee of the House to repeal this section and increase the compensation of our steamers. The bill, however, was not reached in the House. In the Senate the substance of the bill was added to the House shipping bill by a large majority, the section repealing the compulsory law receiving the unanimous sanction of the Senate, so far as the debate shows. The conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, composed of such gentlemen as Mr. VEST, of the Senate, and Messrs. Slocum and DIBBLE, of the House, arranged the differences on this point between the two Houses by withdrawing the section making a large appropriation for steamship mail service, and reporting a simple provision to repeal the law compelling steamers to carry mails after April 1, 1885. The proposition agreed upon was published in the Washington papers, duly reported in both Senate and House, and agreed to without dissent.

The repeal of the compulsory law was at the time universally regarded as just and proper, so far as I heard any expression. Its re-enactment now as proposed by a bill reported by a majority of the Postal Committee would be an act of grave injustice, especially in the face of the fact that the compensation provided for mail service by American steamers is so inadequate. Indeed, it is because the compensation is so inadequate that the compulsory law is recommended by the Postmaster-General. If the compensation were adequate steamships would seek the transportation of the mails.

I call attention to the fact that no nation on the face of the earth has such legislation as is proposed, because all other nations pay sufficient to make compulsion uncalled for.

Such legislation would be regarded as monstrous if it was attempted to apply it to any other private conveyance. The owners of a stage-coach are free to take a contract for carrying the mail or not. The owners of an American coastwise vessel is left at liberty to take the United States mails or not. A British vessel in the same trade as the American is free in our ports to take our mail or not. But the moment any Americans venture to invest their capital in American vessels for the foreign trade it is proposed to compel them to carry the United States mails on such terms as the Postmaster-General may offer, not, however, to exceed sea and inland postage.

The American coastwise steamers which ply between Port Townsend and Tacoma are to be at liberty to carry the mail or not, notwithstanding the compensation is $29,700 for a mileage of 56,183 miles, or 53 cents per mile. But the American steamers in the foreign trade running to Venezuela are to be compelled to take and deliver the mails for $3,942, carrying them a distance of 104,244 miles one way, or 3½ cents per mile. I can not believe that an American Congress, professing to be deeply interested in the American merchant marine and in the maintenance of American steamship lines, will be guilty of such injustice as that.

It is said in defense, however, that American steamers receive the protection of the Government, and therefore that they ought to be compelled to carry our mails at such rates as the Post-Office Department and Congress may offer. But will any one inform me what greater protection or privilege an American vessel in the foreign trade receives from our Government than is accorded a stage-coach or any other conveyance or property? "An American ship may carry the American flag as a shield of defense wherever she goes," says some one. So may an American stage-coach. "It is the duty of the Government to protect the American ship in foreign waters," says another. So it is equally the duty of the Government to protect any American property in foreign waters. Indeed there are to-day several steamers engaged in traffic in Chinese waters—steamers which never entered an American port and have no status as vessels of the United States—which are flying the American flag, and under the protection of our Government simply because they are owned by Americans.

There is not the least excuse for such legislation as is proposed, especially when it is accompanied with compensation which is so shamefully insufficient.

There is grave danger also that so unjust legislation will drive what American steamships we have from under our flag. All that their owners have to do to escape the proposed law is to sell their steamers to Englishmen, register them as British vessels under the British flag, and then charter them for the same trade in which they are now engaged. Thus the Postmaster-General and others who are promoting this legislation would have the proud satisfaction of driving American steamships, subject to use of our Government in case of war, out from under our flag, and converting them into British steamships, subject to use against us in time of war!

When such a measure is candidly considered, I can not believe that an American Congress will consent to its enactment, at least until there is coupled with it a provision which shall insure to the American steamers which it affects as much compensation per mile traveled for carrying our mails as we pay the British Cunard line for a similar service.

DECLINE OF AMERICAN SHIPPING.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] intimated, as has been frequently charged on this floor and elsewhere, that when the Democratic party went out of power in 1860 they left a prosperous and increasing merchant marine; and that whatever decline has come to this important interest is due to the burdens imposed on our shipping by the Republican party.

Inasmuch as there are smaller national charges on American vessels to-day than in 1860, I take it for granted that what the gentleman meant was that the tariff policy of the Democratic party prior to the war had fostered our shipping, and the protective policy of the Republican party had brought ruin upon it.

I regard it so important to keep the discussion of the shipping question out of the tariff vortex and the partisan rut, that I desire to make it clear to the committee and the House that the tariff has had nothing at all to do with the decline of any branch of our merchant marine.

If I were disposed to treat this subject in the narrow way in which those do who charge that the tariff has driven our shipping from the ocean, I could very easily show that the division of our merchant marine which has been protected, to wit, our coastwise shipping, has steadily grown until to-day it is three times as large as the British coastwise marine and five times as large as the home fleet of any other nation, and that this has come notwithstanding the rapid increase of railroad competition. And I could also show that the division of our merchant marine, to wit, that engaged in the foreign carrying trade, which has not been protected since 1850, when the United States admitted British shipping to free participation in this trade on equal terms with our vessels, has steadily declined since 1856. And the friends of protection might argue with much force from this state of facts that the decline of our shipping in the foreign trade, in which it had been contending with British competition on a free-trade basis, simply shows what would come to all our manufacturing industries if we should apply free trade to them.

But the subject is too important to be dismissed either with this partisan protection argument or the partisan anti-protection argument which my friend from Missouri has employed. And I desire to show him and all others who are inclined to dismiss this subject with the remark that our shipping in the foreign trade prospered under the revenue tariffs of 1846 and 1857, and that tariff taxation since 1861 has driven it from the ocean, that there is not the slightest basis for the charge. The conclusive proof of the groundlessness of the charge is found in the fact that the decline of our foreign carrying trade commenced about 1856, and that the annual decline from 1856 to 1861, inclusive, under the revenue tariff and Democratic administrations, was as great as the annual decline since the war under the protective tariff and Republican administrations. When I stated this fact incidentally in the general debate the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS] denied it, as he saw that if it was so then the point he was making, that the Republican policy was responsible for the loss of our foreign carrying trade, had nothing to stand upon. I invite him, therefore, as well as the gentleman from Missouri, and also the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] who, at the Boston merchants' dinner, a few months ago, dwelt so touchingly on the ruin wrought to our shipping by our protective tariff, to look at the official figures of the decline of our foreign carrying trade, which are found in the Report of the Bureau of Statistics on the Commerce of the United States, which I have here.

It will be seen by this report that in 1855, 75½ per cent. of all our exports and imports were carried in American vessels. In the same year also five hundred and seven vessels of the class used in the foreign trade were built in the United States. This was the high-water mark of our shipping in the foreign trade—the discovery of gold in California and the Crimean war having postponed a decline which otherwise would have manifested itself a few years earlier. The decline in our foreign carrying trade and the decline in ship-building for this trade began in 1855–'56, and this decline went steadily on from year to year.

In 1857, there were only three hundred and nine vessels built for the foreign trade, and in 1859 only one hundred and seventeen. The total of our tonnage in the foreign trade, which had increased 12 per cent. per annum up to 1855, was nearly stationary from 1856 to 1861 in spite of the fact that our exports and imports largely increased during this period. This increase was seized upon by foreign vessels. In 1861 only 66½ per cent. of our exports and imports were carried by American vessels. In six years the decline of our foreign carrying trade was 9 per cent., or 1½ per cent. per annum.

In 1861 came the civil war and the confederate cruisers, which in four years swept more than one-third of our shipping in the foreign trade from the ocean either by destruction or transfer to foreign registers to escape capture. During these four years our foreign carrying trade declined 38 per cent., a loss which I am sure my friend from Missouri will not charge to the protective tariff or to the Republican party.

In 1865, the year the war ended, only 27½ per cent. of our exports and imports were carried in American vessels. The decline of our foreign carrying trade has gone on since, but not quite as rapidly as before the war. In 1885 79½ per cent. of our exports and imports were carried in foreign vessels, 5¾ per cent. by rail, and only 14¾ per cent. by American vessels. In twenty years, therefore, since the close of the war the decline in the American carrying trade has been almost 13 per cent., or three-fifths of 1 per cent. per annum, against a decline of 1½ per cent. per annum before the war. The tonnage of the American vessels in the foreign trade is nearly as large as in 1865, but foreign vessels have come in and seized upon the large increase of our exports and imports.

The fact, therefore, should be conceded on all sides that our foreign carrying trade began to decline in 1856 under a revenue tariff and a Democratic administration, and that the decline between 1856 and 1861 was even greater than the annual decline since the war under a protective tariff.

It has been charged that the duties levied by the existing tariff on ship-building material make it more difficult to build vessels in competition with British builders than would have been the case under the tariff of 1846. Tables of the duties on iron are published to show how seriously the present tariff falls on ship-building materials.

I should be pleased to see an enlargement of the list of free materials for ship-building for the foreign trade, and I regret that gentlemen who complain of these duties will not bring in a bill for this purpose unless free ships are linked with it. These gentlemen seem to have overlooked the fact that in 1872 a Republican Congress removed the duties entirely from all lumber, timber, hemp, manila, iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, bolts, copper and composition metal necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels for the foreign trade, and from all articles necessary to repair such vessels; and that in 1883 wire rope was added to the list of free articles for this purpose, together with certain supplies. All of these articles bore a duty under the tariffs of 1846 and 1857. Thus, while it is true that iron generally bears a higher duty now than was imposed by the tariffs of 1846 and 1857, yet the privileges conceded by the acts of 1872, 1883, and 1884 probably make the existing tariff as favorable for ship-building for the foreign trade, so far as the importation of materials is concerned, as the tariffs of 1846 and 1857.

OUR EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

In this connection the charge has been made on this floor and elsewhere that our protective tariff has injured our foreign commerce, and thus deprived our shipping of the cargoes which it possessed under a lower tariff.

The groundlessness of this charge is shown by the official statistics of our foreign commerce, which is measured by the volume of exports and imports. Our foreign commerce never grew so rapidly as it has since the close of the war. The cargoes to be carried from and to this country have multiplied as never before. The difficulty has been that this increase of cargoes has been carried by foreign vessels. If our foreign carrying trade had increased as rapidly as our exports and imports we should have had to-day a merchant marine in the foreign trade four times as large as that which we actually possess.

Let me call the attention of gentlemen who sometimes indulge in the assertion that our protective tariff has destroyed our foreign commerce to the following official statistics from the last report of the Bureau of Statistics:

In 1865, when our civil war closed, the value of our foreign commerce was $404,774,883. In 1881 the value of this commerce had increased to $1,545,041,974, a growth in sixteen years of almost 300 per cent. The increase of our foreign commerce from 1846 to 1861 was only 70 per cent.; and yet there are many persons who are constantly asserting that the palmy days of our foreign commerce were under the tariffs of 1846 and 1861, and that the high tariffs since the war have destroyed our foreign trade.

There are those who are adverting in and out of season to the "unexampled" growth of the foreign commerce of Great Britain in the last twenty years. I desire to call attention to the fact that in 1865 the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom was valued at $2,384,117,140, and in 1881 it was $3,377,863,266, an increase of only 50 per cent., or only one-sixth of the increase of the foreign commerce of the United States. Even including the war period, when the foreign commerce of this country was so seriously impaired and that of Great Britain so prosperous, the statistics show that the value of the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom increased between 1860 and 1885 only 83 per cent., that of France 80 per cent., and that of the United States 95 per cent.

In other words, the foreign commerce of the United States has increased since 1860 more rapidly than that of Great Britain or that of any other nation. Gentlemen who find it convenient to lament what they call the "decline" of our foreign commerce and point to the growth of English commerce as something which our "blind protective policy" prevents us from attaining unto should consult the official statistics.

OUR EXPORT TRADE.

Again, there is no basis for the oft-repeated assertion that the protective tariffs of the United States since 1861 have restricted the export trade of the United States, which, it is assumed, the revenue tariffs in force from 1846 to 1861 had specially fostered.

According to the official statement of Mr. Evans, of the Treasury Department, our exports increased only 16¼ per cent. in the revenue-tariff decade between 1851 and 1861, or 60 per cent., if the years 1850 and 1860 are compared. While in the protective decades between 1861 and 1871 our exports increased 146 per cent., and between 1871 and 1881 increased 59¾ per cent. Our total exports in the decade ending with 1860 were eight hundred and fourteen and one-half millions; in the decade ending with 1880 they were fifty-one hundred and twelve millions.

Comparing population and exports, and the official statistics show that in the decade between 1851 and 1861 our annual exports were $9.94 per inhabitant; in the decade between 1861 and 1871 our annual exports were $10.66 per inhabitant; and in the decade between 1871 and 1881 they rose to $14.93 per inhabitant, and in 1883 to $15.25 per inhabitant.

With an official showing of annual exports of only $9.94 per inhabitant in the revenue-tariff decade between 1851 and 1861, and of $14.93 per inhabitant in the protective decade between 1871 and 1881, it is time that the oft-repeated assumption that protection has destroyed our foreign export trade should no longer be used by men who profess to seek the truth.

Side by side with the official evidence that our foreign exports per inhabitant are 50 per cent. larger under protection than they were under a revenue tariff, having risen from $228,699,486 in 1861, to $898,452,891 in 1881, I wish to place the additional fact that this growth of exports has not been solely in crude products, as many of our free-trade friends aver, but that the growth of our exports of partially and wholly manufactured articles has been even more rapid than the growth of our exports of crude articles.

In the decade between 1851 and 1861 official statistics show that only 16⅔ per cent. of our exports were manufactured goods and only 16 per cent. partially manufactured; but in the decade between 1871 and 1881 20 per cent. of our exports were manufactured, rising in 1883 to 23 per cent. manufactured and 22½ per cent. partially manufactured.

The growth of our exports of manufactured goods will be clearly seen by any one who will take the trouble to examine the official statistics. In the decade between 1851 and 1861 no agricultural implements were exported; but in the decade between 1873 and 1883 the value of these implements exported was twenty-seven millions. In the first decade not a single watch or clock was exported; in the last decade watches to the value of $600,000 and clocks to the value of ten millions. In the first decade forty millions in value of iron and steel were exported, in the last decade one hundred and fifty millions. In the first decade leather and leather goods to the value of ten millions was exported; in the last decade, seventy-eight millions. In the first decade manufactures of wood to the value of eighty-seven millions were exported; and in the last decade one hundred and ninety millions.

And yet there are gentlemen who continue to gravely assert on this floor that protection has destroyed our export trade, particularly in manufactured goods, and taken away cargoes from vessels.

I desire to call the attention of gentlemen who so frequently in this Hall lament the alleged loss through protection of the export trade to various countries, which was supposed to have been so flourishing in the revenue period before the war, to the fact disclosed by the official statistics that there is scarcely a country to which we do not export twice as much, and in many cases three, four, and even five times as much, under our protective policy as we did under a revenue tariff.

In 1860 our exports to Russia were $2,750,000; in 1883 they were $19,000,000.

In 1860 our exports to Germany were $14,750,000; in 1883, $64,250,000.

In 1860 our exports to Belgium were $2,750,000; in 1883, $26,750,000.

In 1860 our exports to Great Britain were $196,250,000; in 1883, $420,500,000.

Or, turning to the East, in 1860 our exports to Japan were $90,000; in 1883, $3,250,000.

In 1860 our exports to Australia were $4,000,000; in 1883, $9,500,000.

To South and Central America, which trade it has been asserted we largely held under revenue tariffs, our exports in 1860 were only $17,500,000, but in 1883, $42,500,000.

Even our exports to the West India Islands have increased from $23,000,000 in 1860 to $32,250,000 in 1883.

I agree, Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER] that the value of our home market is immensely greater than that of all the foreign markets which could possibly be reached, and that it would be unwise to surrender any portion of this home market by a reduction of duties in the vain hope that by so doing we could gain more abroad. The fact that of the ten thousand millions of products of this country in 1880, averaging $200 for each man, woman, and child, nine thousand one hundred and seventy-six millions, or $186 per inhabitant were consumed at home; while in the same year the value of the products of Great Britain were only $172 per inhabitant, of which only $136 per inhabitant was consumed at home, shows conclusively the importance of holding our home market, which is the best in the world, for our own producers.

But, at the same time, while doing nothing that can by any possibility surrender our home market, we should omit no efforts within this limit to extend our markets for surplus products. Our success since the war in so largely holding our own market by a protective tariff, and at the same time rapidly and safely increasing our exports, should encourage us to increase our facilities for reaching foreign markets, particularly the countries of this continent.

OUR FOREIGN CARRYING TRADE.

The causes of the decline of our foreign-carrying trade since 1855, in the face of the unexampled increase of our exports and imports offered for transportation, must evidently be looked for entirely outside of tariffs or mere party issues. They may be briefly stated to be these:

First. The revolution from wood to iron in marine architecture, and from sails to steam in propelling power, which began to be felt about 1855. This gave England an advantage which we had so long, as wooden sailing vessels controlled the commerce of the world.

Second. The admission of our great rival to our carrying trade on equal terms with our vessels about the beginning of 1850, which gave England an opportunity to use the advantage which she gained about 1855, as already stated.

Third. The adoption by England of the policy of aiding the establishment of steamship lines to all parts of the world by postal subsidies. The value of this aid may be appreciated when it is stated that she has expended $200,000,000 for this purpose in the last forty years, not to mention the great assistance she has given her ship-yards by building 80 per cent. of her naval vessels in private establishments.

Fourth. The destruction of one-third of our merchant marine by confederate cruisers between 1861 and 1865, and the advantage which England gained in building up great iron-ship yards while we were engrossed with war.

Fifth. A greater increase of wages of men engaged in ship-building and in the sailing of vessels in the United States in the last twenty years than in the foreign countries which are seizing upon our foreign carrying trade.

Sixth. The great opportunities for uses of capital and enterprise in building railroads, establishing manufacturing industries, and opening up the new West, which have afforded larger profits than could be obtained from the foreign carrying trade in close competition with foreign vessels. The capital and labor put into railroads in the United States in excess of that put into railways in Great Britain since 1855 would have built an ocean-fleet of three times of the whole tonnage now sailing under the British flag.

Without entering at this time upon the question of remedies, I simply have to say that remedies can in due time be applied if the American people and the American Congress think it essential, for both commercial purposes and as a means of defense in war, to have an American merchant marine built in American ship-yards. If they do not; if they regard it as of little consequence whether we have a merchant marine sailing under the American flag, ready to obey the call of the Government in time of need; if they hold it to be of no importance whether we build our vessels on the Clyde and Tyne or in our own ship-yards which can be set to work in an hour's notice to build transports or cruisers when war comes; if they believe that there is nothing but childish "sentiment" in the proposition to have our mails carried in American steamships in preference to British steamships even if it costs a little more, then of course it will not be many years before the legitimate fruits of such ideas will show themselves, and American vessels be found nowhere outside of the coastwise trade.

But if the American people and the American Congress shall come to believe, as Jefferson declared in his celebrated report on commerce, that an American merchant marine built in American ship-yards is as essential as forts for purposes of defense, then will steps be take to realize so important a result.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. I yield the ten minutes which remain to me to my colleague, the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOUNT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has an hour.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy.

It further announced the passage of the bill (S. 1487) to establish two additional land districts in the State of Nebraska, with amendments, in which concurrence was requested.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BEACH took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to tl e House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 1319) to increase the pension of Robert D. Fort;

An act (H. R. 1625) for the relief of Frances McNeil Potter;

An act (H. R. 2021) granting a pension to Margaret A. Blake;

An act (H. R. 1008) for the relief of Victor Beauboucher;

An act (H. R. 1245) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National of Shakopee, Minn.;

An act (H. R. 4982) to enable the Public Printer to continue in effect the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Public Printer to remove certain material from the Government Printing Office," approved February 6, 1883;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building;

An act (H. R. 5841) granting a pension to Almira Russell Hancock, widow of Winfield Scott Hancock, late a major-general in the United States Army; and

An act (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. BLOUNT. In the opening of this debate the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] discussed mainly three propositions: first, the action of the Postmaster-General in declining to use the sum of $400,000 to pay American steamers for the transportation of our foreign mails; secondly, his failure to pay to the postal clerks the maximum amount which he might have allowed them under the law; and, thirdly, the action of the present administration in the enforcement of the civil-service policy as announced.

The last proposition is so remote from the bill before the House that it will be readily conceded a more fitting time will present itself for the purpose of replying to those strictures in the future.

So far as regards the strictures of the gentleman upon the action of the Postmaster-General in the matter of the pay of clerks, the answer of that official to a resolution of inquiry offered by the gentleman from Michigan, and which he as it seems carefully withheld from the House to enable his attack to be successful, it appears to me is a complete answer to the gentleman's entire argument, and I shall ask the liberty of printing it in connection with my remarks. With this I dismiss for the present the subject of the postal clerks.

The action of the Postmaster-General in refusing to use the $400,000 has given rise to a great deal of denunciation by the steamship companies and by such portions of the press as they have been able to utilize; and the misstatements that have appeared in connection with the discussion must have made some lodgment in the public mind, or the gentleman from Michigan and others would not have seen fit to repeat them here. The Postmaster-General in assuming the discharge of the duties of that Department has evidently studied our foreign mail service in its amount, in its points of destination, in the legislation relating to it throughout its history, in the reports to be found upon that subject, and it is evident has carefully examined the discussion in relation to the bill about which he has received so much criticism. Not only has he done this, but this very grave question was made the subject of a Cabinet consultation, and the action which has been reported by the Postmaster-General received the sanction of the President and of his distinguished Cabinet. Whatever, therefore, of error, of crime attaches to a failure to use this fund attaches not alone to the Postmaster-General, but attaches also to the President and to the Cabinet.

Mr. Chairman, by reason of frequent use we have become exceedingly familiar with our internal postal system, both in relation to transportation and to postage rates. As regards our foreign mail service, by reason of the fact that we have so little connection with it we do not enjoy the same familiarity and knowledge.

I wish to ask the attention of the committee, especially in the light of the appeal of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] for a just and fair consideration of these questions, to some official statements which speak louder than the gentleman's opinion as to whether just compensation is allowed the American steamships or not.

I wish to call attention first to a tabular statement which is presented on page 818 of the report of the Postmaster-General. In that statement, as gentlemen will find, are set forth the percentages of mail matter carried from this to different foreign countries. It appears that to Great Britain alone the percentage is 40.37; to Germany, 23.46; to the Hawaiian Islands, Japan, Hong-Kong, China, Tahiti, the Marquesas Islands, New Caledonia, Cochin China, Straits Settlements, and Java, 1.96. This is that great mail to China and Japan and adjacent countries which is regarded as so magnificent in its proportions that its transportation would justify the enormous compensation demanded and advocated here. The percentage of mail matter in that mail is 1.96. To Brazil and other South American countries the proportion is 1.48. Mr. Chairman, it is easy by an examination of these tables to ascertain that our foreign mail is almost entirely transatlantic, and destined to points which are not reached by our steamers at all.

The statement of sums reported as paid on account of sea transportation of mails dispatched to and received from foreign countries during the year 1885 shows, in round numbers, an aggregate of $331,000, of which the transatlantic mail cost $270,000—a just and reasonable proportion when you take into account the percentage of the transatlantic mail as compared with that of the mails to China and Japan and to the South American countries.

I ask attention for a moment to that transatlantic mail service. First as to the number of trips: There go out from this country annually to Europe four hundred and forty-seven mails, more than one mail per day. The amount of mail matter carried per trip, notwithstanding the great number of trips, is 4,931 pounds. The amount paid per trip is $609.36. If the transportation of that mail were paid for at freight rates it would cost only $17.75; if paid for at parcel dispatch rates, the cost would be $160.36; while the amount actually paid, the sea postage, is $609.36 or thirty-four times the amount of the freight rates. Again, if paid by the sea and inland postage, the amount would be $1,857 as against $17.75 freight rates. I will not insist that the freight rate would be an equitable rate of compensation for the service, but I do insist that the express rate is not an unfair guide as to what would be fair compensation. Why? The mail as it is carried abroad is put in bags, moved at one time to the ship, put on board and into the mail-room, the door is locked, and the key remains in charge of the purser until the vessel lands in Europe, when the mail is delivered to the postmaster.

The same accommodation as to room, the same requirement as to care, the same requirement as to delivery when the ship reaches her destination, applies to mail matter and to express matter. Is there any reason, then, why the Government should pay more for this service to these vessels engaged in commerce than private individuals should pay for like service in the carriage and delivery of express parcels?

The rates which I have cited are taken from the advertisements of these very lines.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us turn for a time to some of the American lines that are complaining. I call attention first to the Pacific Mail line from San Francisco to Panama. On that line there are twenty-five trips as against four hundred and forty-seven on the transatlantic route. The average number of pounds carried per trip is 573—a good mule could carry it.

The average amount actually paid per trip is $49.53. If a private individual were to put that mail on board as freight the charge for transporting it would be $2.86. If a private individual were to put it on board at parcel-dispatch or express rates the charge would be $40.12. If paid for the service at the sea and inland postage rate this very line would get $140.20. The Postmaster-General tendered that compensation and it was declined.

Let us now take the Pacific Mail line from New York to Colon. On that line there are thirty-eight trips. There are 2,899 pounds of mail carried per trip; the amount paid per trip is $199.45. If that mail were carried as freight the charge would be $1.11; if paid for at express rates it would be $102.95; if paid for by the sea and inland postage, which the Postmaster-General intended, the amount would have been $517.43.

Take the Pacific Mail Steamship service from San Francisco to Yokohama and Hong-Kong. During the last fiscal year there were eighteen trips. The average number of pounds of mail matter per trip was 2,088. The amount paid per trip was $194.81. If the matter had been paid for at freight rates the amount would have been $12.56, if paid for at express rate $208.80, and if paid for at sea and inland postage $562.54, which this company refused to take, insisting that a larger sum should be paid them for carrying the mails of their country.

So in the service by the New York, Havana, and Mexican Steamship Company there were fifty trips. The average quantity of mail matter per trip was 993 pounds. The Government paid $82.68 per trip. The freight rates would have amounted to $2.58, the express rates $64.58. The Government offered to pay $238, which this company declined to receive, declaring it inadequate compensation.

On the New York and Cuba line there were seventy-one trips. The average quantity of mail matter per trip was 413 pounds. The amount paid was $38.01. The freight rates would have been $1.01. If a similar quantity of merchandise had been carried at express rates for a private citizen the charge would have been $26.87. The amount offered this company was $113.23, which they declined and threw off the mails.

Now take the New York and Venezuela line. There were thirty-eight trips. The average number of pounds of mail matter carried was 494. The amount paid per trip was $56.55. If paid at freight rates the amount would have been $1.74; at express rates $33.93; at sea and inland postage, which the Government tendered, $115.01. And yet officials of this company have been before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to demand $2,500 per trip! That they regard as reasonable compensation for the service; and I suppose there are gentlemen in this House who can bring themselves to regard it in the same light.

So the Brazil Steamship Company made thirteen trips, carrying on the average 2,118 pounds of mail matter per trip. The actual amount paid per trip was $323. At freight rates the amount charged would have been $11.65; at express rates, $137.68. The Government tendered $445.53, which this company declined as payment. But I must say in justice to the company that they have continued to carry, and are to-day carrying, the mails, while insisting that there shall be what they deem equitable compensation paid in consideration of the service.

The Postmaster-General, in his report, uses the following language:

> The total weight of the transatlantic mails carried from New York last year by eight lines of ships was 2,194,066 pounds, and at sea postage yielded to the carriers $270,157.63, the compensation varying from $2,854.39 for the most profitable trip to 19 cents for the lightest, and averaging $609.36 per trip the year through. This was over thirty-four times what the same weight of freight would have been transported for, and nearly four times the charge for parcels of dispatch matter of the same quantity; and these rates increase in disproportion on the better trips, on which, in fact, the mail was chiefly carried. These figures prove the rate of sea postage to be abundant. Undoubtedly the transatlantic carriage could be procured at lower rates, if it were desirable to forego frequency of transmission and employ but one or two lines instead of all.
> The American lines have received a less compensation in amount only because the mails they carried have been so small in quantity. But 8.37 per cent. of our foreign letter mails last year was sent to all the countries and islands of this continent and across the Pacific seas, and not so much by all the American steamships.

Now, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] only a few moments ago said that the Government does not pay American steamers for carrying our foreign mails nearly so much as is paid to the railroads, to the steamboats, and to the star-route service. I am obliged to challenge this statement. I hold in my hand an official statement on this subject prepared at the Post-Office Department. Before reading it I wish to call attention to a provision of the international postal convention, which must be taken into consideration in this calculation. Under that convention the postage on mail matter originating in this country and destined for foreign countries is paid here, while the postage on mail matter originating in foreign countries and destined for this country is paid by those countries. This is an important provision, which seems to have been entirely overlooked in all the discussion heretofore had on this subject.

The table to which I have just referred shows that the railroad companies are paid 10.95 cents per mile; the star routes, 6.52 cents; the steamboat and coastwise service, 15.9 cents; the American steamships to foreign ports receive as outward sea postage 4.5 cents. If they were paid sea and inland postage, which was tendered by the Postmaster-General to all the lines, the compensation would be 11.09 cents. On the eight principal lines of American steamships the outward sea postage was 5.3 cents. These eight lines (and they are the complaining lines), if paid sea and inland postage, would receive 14.04 cents.

But here comes in an element which is not applicable to the star-route service, not applicable to the steamboat service, not applicable to the railroad service. On their return trips these eight steamship lines which are refusing to carry the mails of their country, which protects them on every sea, are taking subsidies to the extent of 51 cents per mile. So that it appears that these complaining steamship companies, instead of not getting so much pay as is given to the railroads, the steamboats, and the star-route service, are actually receiving a compensation of 51 cents per mile, while the railroad companies are getting 10.95 cents, the star routes 6.52 cents, the steamboat and coastwise service 15.9 cents.

Mr. Chairman, it seems wonderful in the light of these official statements, which can be verified from the highest sources, how people interested in legislation can parade through the press and in debates on the floor of Congress such a gross misstatement and induce legislation upon it.

But, sir, let us look at this from another standpoint. They are paid more. I insist they ought to be paid less, and why? These American steamers are traversing the ocean as instruments of commerce. That commerce is their inducement to take the sea. The little mail matter they carry is but an incident to that transportation, and is in aid of their commercial transactions and their profit.

The steamboat lines are brought into the service not by trade, but brought there for the purpose of carrying the mails, and they can not live without it. The star routes live entirely on the mail. They have no trade. They carry none of the commodities of commerce. They must rely entirely on the mail. Therefore, the attempted comparison, though fatal when you come to consider the figures, is still more so when you come to look at the nature of the service.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to invite the attention of this committee to another subject. It has been stated in the two Houses of Congress since this question came under discussion that had the mail pay remained the same as it was prior to the postal treaties of 1874 there would have been no complaint made about the compensation to these steamship companies; that it would have been ample. The distinguished gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Horr, not now a member of this House, but at that time he represented the minority in this discussion, used the following language:

> How came we to be in this condition we are now in? I wish every member to give me his attention on this point. Formerly these ships received 40 cents a letter for over one-half of the ports to which they carried our letters. Twenty-five cents a letter to China and Japan, and 30 cents a letter from the United States to Australia. September 15, 1874, a conference of nations met at Berne. There were twenty-one nations represented. They adjourned, and in 1875 reassembled at Paris, and there entered into an arrangement whereby this postage was cut down, and instead of paying 25, 30, and 40 cents a letter, after that conference we have paid 2 and 3 cents only a letter.

This same statement of fact was repeated in the Senate Chamber.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is wonderful, when you come to examine the record, that there was not prior to 1874, when these satisfactory rates existed, in any country on the face of God's earth to which our mails went where 40 cents a letter was allowed. Not one, sir; and yet the gentleman says that to over one-half of the ports of the world our steamers carried our letters for 40 cents; 25 cents a letter to China and Japan, and 30 cents a letter from the United States to Australia. Any gentleman who will take the trouble to examine the Postal Laws and Regulations prior to that treaty will find on page 309 an absolute official refutation of these exaggerated statements upon which that $400,000 was invited.

I take from it as it has been prepared by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails the following statement, which covers every one of these lines to which this reference prior to 1874 was made:

> Prior to 1874 the rate to Brazil was 15 cents; to Uruguay and Paraguay, 18 cents; to Mexico, 10 cents; to the West Indies, 10 cents; to Venezuela, 10 cents; to the United States of Colombia and to Central and South America via Panama and Colon, 10 cents; to China and Japan—
> Cited at 25 cents a letter—
> 10 cents; Hawaii, 6 cents; Australia, 10 and 12 cents.

That treaty reduced it to these several countries to 5 cents per half ounce.

The rate was reduced somewhat, as appears from these statements, but there appears alongside of this comparison that in 1874 there was collected at these magnificent rates prior to the treaties the sum of $95,769.23; and in 1885 collected the sum of $137,519.80. And the same little mail-room which carried it in 1874 carries it at this day. And not only is that true, but oftentimes they put express matter in there with the mails.

You then readily see, Mr. Chairman, the flagrant misstatements that have attended this discussion always. It is not exceptional here. I have never known a question of any magnitude in reference to bills asking Government aid that was not attended with more or less misstatements and in which there was not an effort to delude and misinform the House, while the proportion of success attending such efforts is always in direct proportion with its magnitude, and I have never known an instance where if gentlemen sought to get at the bottom of the matter they have not found this plea made up entirely of misstatements.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WAKEFIELD] has already shown the many advantages the American mail steamers are afforded, in port privileges, reduced freight rates, &c., and I will not take up the time of the committee with a repetition of them, especially as it has been so well stated by him already.

Mr. Chairman, I wish briefly to advert now to the record of the repeal of the sections 3976 and 4203 of the Revised Statutes, which are sometimes designated the "compulsory clauses;" and I may be permitted to say in this connection that these compulsory clauses, which have been so much denounced, were first introduced into the Senate of the United States by the late Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, and were based on petitions of citizens of Boston, setting forth the fact that American mail steamers confused commerce by refusing to carry the mails without extra large rates of pay. I will also allude to what has been referred to by other gentlemen, that the Postmaster-General himself, Mr. Blair, cited the same condition of affairs when it was finally adopted in 1864.

How were these statutes repealed? These provisions of the law were repealed in a conference report, which never had any consideration whatever by this House. It was done on what was known as the "shipping bill." The Senate had attached an amendment that brought the conferees together. That amendment was abandoned, but in lieu thereof there was substituted by the Senate a repeal of these compulsory clauses. The rules of the House required of the conferees that it should be their duty to accompany their conference report with a statement of what it contained, setting forth the effect of the adoption of the report fully before the House, in order that the House might see how legislation was effected in such report. No such statement accompanied that conference report.

That committee failed utterly to make it. There was never a line communicated to the House as to what was even done by the report. This report was adopted, I think, about the 18th of June. Soon after the Congress adjourned. I did not know, numbers of gentlemen recognized by the nation as leaders of political thought in this country sat here and failed to learn, for there was nothing to arrest their attention that there was anything in the report which repealed these compulsory provisions. That session of Congress adjourned and the second session convened.

The repeal of these compulsory provisions would never have been agreed to had the House understood the situation; and now for the proof of it. The Committee on Appropriations of that House, accepting the correctness of subsidies, brought into the Post-Office bill a provision very like the one we are now discussing. It was promptly stricken out from that bill the very instant the alarm was given. Then the bill went to the Senate, and there the Senate placed a subsidy upon it, and it came back to the House, and the House acted upon it and again rejected that provision by a majority of 14 votes. Then came a conference and a disagreement, and the conferees, two of them, made the following statements to this House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], in charge of the bill at the time, said:

I will say to the House now frankly that it does seem to me that we are brought face to face with the question of whether this bill shall fail or whether we shall adopt the proposition submitted by the Senate or whether some terms of compromise shall be submitted. We have been unable to agree upon any terms of compromise. I now desire to leave it to the House to decide the question as to what shall be done in regard to the bill.

Mr. Horr, another of the conferees, used the following language:

Mr. Speaker, I make this motion for the purpose of avoiding an extra session of Congress.

This, Mr. Chairman, was passed at midnight on the 3d of March. The venerable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], seeing the situation, arose in his place and pleaded with the House that he could not bring his mind to the point which other gentlemen had reached, that the Senate of the United States intended to have this subsidy in or that not a dollar should be provided for the postal service of the country. The gentleman from Indiana pleaded in vain. The members of the House were untrue to their trust; that subsidy was assented to by a very small vote. Congress then adjourned. The next day Mr. Cleveland became President of the United States, and following that Mr. Vilas Postmaster-General; and now we come, Mr. Chairman, to another act in this scheme of fastening a subsidy on the American people.

Office of Superintendent of Foreign Mails:
For transportation of foreign mails, including transit across the Isthmus of Panama, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the transportation of any part of said foreign mails, after legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder, at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points: Provided, That the mails so contracted shall be carried on American steamships, and that the aggregate of such contracts shall not exceed one-half of the sum hereby appropriated.

It is urged by the attorneys and agents of these several companies that the Postmaster-General of the United States could have executed the provisions of this law if he had desired to do so, and that he has criminally conflicted with the will of the Congress of the United States in that regard.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] in his remarks says:

Read the law, and it seems easy of comprehension. What does it require? First, a contract with American steamships for carrying any portion of the foreign mails; second, after legal advertisement; third, to the lowest responsible bidder; fourth, at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile each way actually traveled; and fifth, $400,000 is hereby appropriated to carry out contracts so made. Is there anything obscure in this statute? Certainly nothing. And yet no portion of this law has been executed.

The gentleman analyzes the law. Now I will put it in another form.

The Postmaster-General, after legal advertisement, after competitive bidding by bidders in good faith, may contract with the lowest responsible bidder at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a mile the round trip. The Postmaster-General could not but understand that the Congress of the United States, when it threw around the subject all these provisions, meant that that should be an honest competition, that there should be no fraud about this matter, and that he was vested with discretion for this and other questions. In so construing the words "hereby authorized" he followed the construction put by his predecessors on similar statutes. When he came to look at the situation, he found that upon every one of these mail routes save two there was but one mail line. In the exercise of that discretion vested in him by the laws of the land he believed that on those lines he could not have competition. He declined to advertise, therefore, for that reason. There could come nothing of it but bogus bidders and waste of time.

The gentleman from Michigan asks how he could know there would not be bidding. "There are a lot of our ships lying up in New York. How does he know there is to be competition in the star routes?" Mr. Chairman, he knows it because he has been living in this country, and he knows the service as it is being carried on every day and has been from the beginning of that star-route service; and he knows that invariably the Postmaster-General invites competition in that service and always finds it.

But in the matter of the American steamers he sees the great difficulties with which they are struggling. He knew how they had been driven from the seas, and that there were more lucrative employments than an attempt to compete in the carrying of the mail. The payments for that service were too small and insignificant to bring out such competition. If the commerce had not been large enough to retain them in the service, the mail pay was too small to bring them in.

On the Cuba line there was competition. The Postmaster-General in that case has provided a far better mail to Cuba, more frequent in trips, and with greater speed, and so far as that is concerned I think no harm has come to the service.

Now, when you reach the China mail you find two lines there. You propose to give the mails to one of them. You have got the Occidental and Oriental companies carrying the mail now at sea and inland postage and glad to get it. And who is hurt? Nobody but the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. Why should we be so tender of that concern? Have we forgotten what has been referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER], that in the Forty-seventh Congress that company spent $702,000 as a corruption fund to get a subsidy? Have we forgotten that in January, 1879, they entered into contract with the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads that they should receive certain rates for freight, that they would make two trips per month and no more from New York to Aspinwall and from Panama to San Francisco, and that these ships were to receive a large subsidy from those two railroads, made up on freights and passengers carried on the railroad lines out of the moneys justly due to the Government for the railroad indebtedness, and that these contracts have been repeated ever since until the recent action of the Secretary of the Interior caused them to be terminated?

Mr. Chairman, is this building up American commerce? I, sir, have fought with the anti-subsidy leaders on this floor against the Senate and the Executive for years, and I did feel for a time as though the struggle were to continue on these lines. But, thank God, we have an administration now that does not understand this mode of building up American ships.

Mr. Vilas has been denounced on this floor for his failure to use this fund. Gentlemen, you who desire to indulge in that denunciation, continue to do so on this floor, on every stump, at every point where the human ear can catch a human accent, and when your voices have grown hoarse or, indeed, even silenced from exhaustion, you will hear other and harmonious voices rising and swelling and filling the land in praise of W. F. Vilas, that Postmaster-General who had the ability and the courage to do his duty in spite of all these execrations and to remain true to the great principles of his party.

My time, Mr. Chairman, is so nearly expired that it is not worth my while to attempt to proceed any further. So I will yield the floor, and move to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

Memorandum of an agreement between the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, parties of the first part, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, party of the second part, made and entered into this 17th day of January, 1879.

First. The said railroad companies, on consideration of the undertakings of the steamship company hereinafter contained, jointly and severally undertake, promise, and agree to and with said steamship company to guarantee that the gross earnings upon the freight to be provided to said steamship company by said railroad companies, as hereinafter ageeed, shall be $48,000 per month for the West-bound freight and $35,000 per month for the East-bound freight. It being understood that in case the earnings of said steamship company from said freight, that is to say, not exceeding 600 tons, as hereinafter provided, should in any month exceed the amount guaranteed, then the excess shall be due and payable by the said steamship company to the said railroad companies, and the moneys received on all freight between New York and San Francisco and between San Francisco and New York in excess of said 600 tons shall be equally divided, one-half to said railroad companies and one-half to said steamship company.

Second. The said railroad companies further jointly and severally undertake, promise, and agree to and with the said steamship company that they will pay to the said steamship company $5 for each passenger carried by them over their roads whose tickets are purchased at points east of Ogdensburg, Suspension Bridge, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, and Wheeling to points west of Sacramento, and vice versa, during the continuance of this agreement.

Third. The arrangements between the parties hereto in regard to freight received by the steamship company in San Francisco for transportation to Europe via Panama shall remain as at present, but the railroad companies agree with the steamship company that the same shall be referred to their representatives at San Francisco, in order that if the same is found practicable an agreement may be arrived at between them on a basis permitting said steamship company to take said class of freight when and so far as it does not in any manner conflict with the business of said railroad companies overland.

Fourth. In consideration of the foregoing undertakings of the said railroad companies, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company promises and agrees with said railroad companies that it, the said steamship company, will dispatch from the port of New York for Aspinwall two through steamers per month and no more, and two steamers connecting therewith from Panama to San Francisco, and from the port of San Francisco to Panama two through steamers per month and no more, and two steamers connecting therewith from Aspinwall to New York, and that said steamship company will permit said railroad companies jointly to fix the rates at which all freight shall be transported by the vesssels of the steamship company from the port of New York to the port of San Francisco and from the port of San Francisco to the port of New York, and will furnish room in each of said steamers from New Yord and San Francisco, respectively, for the transportation of, and will transport such freight as may be so obtained under rates fixed by the railroad companies to, an amount not exceeding 600 tons, of 2,000 pounds each, upon any one of said steamers.

Fifth. The said steamship company further promises and agrees that during the continuance of this agreement it will maintain the passenger rates now published as being in force for transportation between New York and San Francisco, and will make no concession by payment of commission or otherwise from them in any form for the purpose of inducing travel via its steamers: Provided, That in case said railroad companies shall reduce their passenger rates from those at present in force the steamship company shall be at liberty to reduce its rates to the same extent.

Sixth. It is mutually agreed that settlement shall be made for each month upon the 15th day of the following month, or as soon thereafter as the accounts with connecting roads can be adjusted.

Seventh. The said steamship company may, on demand, examine the books and reports of the railroad agents at Omaha in order to ascertain the number of passengers for which it is entitled to payment, and the said railroad companies may on demand examine the books and accounts of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for the purpose of obtaining full details as to freight and passengers transported by said steamship company under this agreement.

Eighth. It is further mutually agreed that this contract shall be deemed to have commenced on the 1st day of December, 1878, and shall continue in force for one year therefrom, unless either party should desire to terminate it sooner, and in that event either party shall have the right to do so upon giving to the other sixty days' notice in writing.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their corporate seals the day and year first above written.

There being no objection, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with, and the Clerk, proceeding to read it by paragraphs for amendment, read the following:

Office of the Postmaster-General:

For mail depredations and post-office inspectors, and fees to United States marshals, attorneys, and the necessary incidental expenses connected therewith, $200,000.

For advertising, $20,000.

For miscellaneous items in the office of the Postmaster-General, $1,500.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to strike out the last word, offering that formal amendment for the purpose of making one statement with regard to the subject just referred to by the gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and other gentlemen during this discussion have criticised the Postmaster-General severely because he did not advertise for carrying the foreign mail under the act of March 3, 1885, which authorizes contracts for carrying the mail on American vessels at not exceeding 50 cents to the nautical mile. I want to remind gentlemen that that statute is not the only one in existence which authorizes the Postmaster-General to make contracts for carrying the foreign mail. They will find in section 4009 of the Revised Statutes a provision which is just as binding on the Postmaster-General as the clause in the last appropriation bill.

Section 4009 provides as follows:

For transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, the Postmaster-General may allow as compensation, if by a United States steamship, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage; and if by a foreign steamship or by a sailing vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea postage on the mails so transported.

These two different acts were in existence at the time the Postmaster-General took the course which he did in regard to the appropriation of last session.

In view of these statutory provisions on the subject he was authorized to select that which he deemed to be most in the interest of the people. He did make that selection, and he tendered to the American steamship companies the sea and inland postage, as he was authorized by law to do. For taking that course the Postmaster-General has been severely criticised by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and others.

I want to inform those gentlemen, however, that there has been a new departure in dealing with this subject. That departure was made on the 4th day of March, 1885, when Grover Cleveland was inaugurated President of the United States and thereafter when his new Cabinet was appointed. But it seems to be marvelous to gentlemen upon the other side of this House that a Postmaster-General should administer the laws of Congress in the interest of the people instead of in the interest of the steamship companies and other great corporations. That has been done in this case, and instead of being criticised the Postmaster-General ought to receive the encomiums of Congress, and I know he will receive the plaudits of the American people. I want to remind the committee and gentlemen on the other side of the House that the Post-Office Department is hereafter to be administered in the interest of the people of this country. The sums which they may contribute for carrying the mails will hereafter be paid for legitimate service and not for the purpose of subsidizing steamship lines to aid commerce or for any other extraneous purpose. The Postmaster-General has performed simply his duty under the law. He has relieved the Government of great embarrassment by the wisdom which he has shown in the administration of the law during the past year. Instead of permitting himself to be dictated to by these great corporations, he has executed the law in the public interest. For this he should receive the thanks of Congress, as he assuredly will receive the approbation of the American people. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of replying to the statement just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. He says that the Postmaster-General refused to execute the law enacted by the Forty-eighth Congress because it proposed to give subsidies to American steamships. The amount which would have been given under that law to the Brazilian line if that law had been enforced according to the intention of its friends would have been between $36,000 and $40,000.

The amount that was offered by the Postmaster-General was only $4,210, or the sea and inland postage. But it seems from a statement in to-day's paper that the amount which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has said was abundant compensation has been decided by the Postmaster-General himself to be utterly inadequate, for he sent our mail by the Brazilian steamers during the past year under a private arrangement with them that when Congress should assemble he would recommend that special compensation should be given them, and under that recommendation only yesterday in the Senate a bill was introduced to pay the Brazilian steamship line the $36,000, about the same sum which would have been paid to that company under the act of 1885 which is now stigmatized as a subsidy law. That amount, determined now to be reasonable compensation and not a subsidy, was all that would have been paid to the Brazilian company if the act of 1885 had been executed, as many of its friends supposed it would be.

It was intended that about $300,000 should be paid to the various American steamship lines; which would have given $40,000 to the Brazilian line and about $40,000 to the China line. And these amounts would have been more per mile than are being paid to-day per mile to the British Cunard and White Star lines for the transportation of our mails—not subsides, but simply fair compensation. If that act had been enforced according to the spirit in which it was passed, we should have had reasonable compensation given to all existing American lines on an expenditure of $300,000, and a balance of $100,000 would have been available for the establishment of a new postal line to carry our mails to Rio, to Montevideo, and other points in South America where we desire to extend our trade.

Mr. Chairman, I protest here and elsewhere against the accusation that the payment of $40,000 to the Brazilian line for carrying our mails a distance of 5,500 miles would have been a subsidy in the sense in which that word is used here. When $29,000 is paid for carrying our mails between Port Townsend and Tacoma, we are told that that is fair compensation; when $18,000 is paid for carrying the mails between Norfolk and Baltimore, although the distance is only 200 miles, it is said that this is only fair compensation; but when it is proposed to pay $40,000 to an American steamship line to transport the mails between the United States and Brazil, a distance of 5,500 miles, then we are told that it is a subsidy. Mr. Chairman, let us get down fairly and candidly to the facts as they exist, and when we do that we shall find that the $400,000 covered by the postal appropriation law enacted by the last Congress, by which $300,000 would have gone to existing American steamship lines including $40,000 to be given to the Brazilian line for carrying our mails, and $100,000 to new lines, was not a subsidy but only fair compensation on any reasonable basis on which it can be determined.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman will permit me to ask him how the Postmaster-General, under the act of the last Congress, is to apportion the money as the gentleman proposes? The law requires that the Postmaster-General shall ask for bids, and does not allow him to apportion the money according to his discretion.

Mr. DINGLEY. But in the advertisements that he issues he might have provided that the compensation on each line should not exceed a certain sum per mile. The Postmaster-General, under the law, is authorized to do that with reference to all bids for mail service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY obtained the floor.

Mr. BURROWS. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] will yield his time to enable the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to conclude his remarks I will promise to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is satisfactory to me. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, on the point just suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], I wish to say that under the act of 1885, which provided for "lawful advertisement"— i. e., advertisement governed by the general law relating to postal advertisements and bids—the Postmaster-General had authority to limit in his advertisement the amount for which he would accept a bid, and to fix such a limit as he deemed reasonable in reference to each of these several lines, or to reject all bids if he found them too high and advertise again. If he had thus limited the amounts somewhat on the basis I have suggested, we should to-day have had all these American steamship lines carrying our mails at reasonable rates, not more than $40,000 for the line to Brazil, not more than $40,000 for the line to China, not more than $35,000 for the line to Venezuela, instead of the mere pittance of $3,140 now paid; and we should also have had to-day American steamship lines running to Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, and American trade extending in those directions instead of what we see to-day.

I ask gentlemen not to be turned aside by cries of "subsidy" when all that is asked is simply that the same reasonable pay be given to American steamships in our foreign trade that is given to American steamships in the coastwise trade. We should not call the compensation paid to American steamships in the coastwise trade fair pay, and yet in regard to American steamships in the foreign trade characterize the same proportionate compensation as "subsidy," and thus invite British lines to take the places which American steamships should occupy.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The gentleman, as I understand, says that this pay is not subsidy but compensation.

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Now, I want to ask him whether $40,000 per line, which he has suggested, is based upon the amount of mail carried.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is based on the distance traveled.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Then it is based upon the distance traveled, and is not pay for the service rendered to the Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. It rests upon the same basis precisely as the compensation to every one of our star-route lines, to every one of your coastwise steamer lines. In all these cases the pay is based not on the weight of the mail, but on length of the route and frequency of service—in other words, the distance traveled. We ask simply that you apply the same principle to an American steamship engaged in the foreign trade that you apply to your coastwise-steamer service, to the star-route service, to the steamboats upon our rivers. Do this, and there will be no trouble. Do not, I beseech you, gentlemen, meet this important proposition simply by the cry of "subsidy," when all that is asked is that you shall apply the same principle in the one case that you do in another.

I ask the gentleman from West Virginia why the Government should pay, as it is doing, to the steamer in the coastwise trade running from Baltimore to Norfolk, a distance of only 200 miles, $18,000 for carrying the mail, and yet say to an American steamship line running to Venezuela, a distance of over 3,000 miles, that it shall have only $3,140—shall claim that this is fair compensation, and that if you offer to pay a larger amount, an amount proportionate to that paid to the service between Norfolk and Baltimore, it is "subsidy?" Let us be reasonable in this matter, and not undertake to frown down considerations of fairness and justice by cries of "subsidy."

I want to call attention also to the fact that in our coastwise trade lines for carrying the mail are being established where commercial considerations are the chief elements in determining whether they shall be established or not. Pray, why is the line from Norfolk to Baltimore maintained to-day by the Post-Office Department if it is not mainly for commercial reasons? Our whole mail can be carried by the railroads; yet the steamship line is supported and properly supported to the amount of $18,000 by postal appropriations of the Government. I find no fault with this. But when we come to the important matter of maintaining American steamships to connect this country with the South American countries, with which we desire to develop trade, I ask that the cry of "subsidy" shall not be reiterated, and that we shall not be told the question has nothing to do with commercial considerations.

Mr. BURROWS obtained the floor and said: In return for the courtesy of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], I now yield my five minutes to him.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, in the exercise of the discretion used by the Postmaster-General under the law of March 3, 1885, that officer declined to advertise for bids, and for that refusal he has been subjected to what seems to me unmerited criticism.

Mr. Chairman, I find that this is not the first instance in the history of this Government where an executive officer clothed with discretion has declined to execute provisions of law. Assuming that where discretion was authorized Congress intended in good faith to permit its exercise, several officials have refused to carry out certain laws.

In the act of Congress making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Governnment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and approved March 3, 1881, the sum of $200,000 was appropriated "to enable the Secretary of the Navy to establish at the Isthmus of Panama naval stations and depots for coal for the supply of steamships of war, to be available for expenditure as soon as suitable arrangements can be made to the proposed end." Here was a law vesting the Secretary of the Navy with authority to use his discretion. The officer at that time was William H. Hunt, and for reasons which seemed to him sufficient he declined to execute the provisions of that law, and on pages 24 and 25 of his report to the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress he uses the following lanaguage:

Constantly, since the passage of this act, the Department has been importuned to expend the sum here appropriated in acquiring title to certain rights upon the isthmus, claimed to belong to Ambrose W. Thompson, as the representative of a corporation styling itself the Chiriqui Improvement Company. The appropriation seems to have been granted in pursuance of the recommendation of Hon. N. Goff, jr., Secretary of the Navy, in a report made by him to President Hayes, under date of January 19, 1881. This report was submitted by President Hayes in a message to the House of Representatives, dated February 2, 1881. It is evident that the report of the Secretary of the Navy and the message of the President contemplated the establishment of the naval stations and depots claimed to belong to the Chiriqui Improvement Company and Ambrose W. Thompson. Indeed, Hon. R. W. Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, in his report under date November 30, 1880, states that he had "caused coal to be deposited in small quantities on these lands for use by our vessels whenever it may be needed." This step was taken with a view to acquiring title to these lands by our Government.

The appropriation, however, seems to have carefully avoided all mention of these lands, or of any other specific lands for the contemplated coal stations. Under the general instructions of this authorization I have been unable to satisfy myself that the interests of the Government will be advanced by the payment of this sum, or any portion of it, for the grant represented by Mr. Thompson. From reports made to the Department from reliable sources, since the passage of the appropriation and before, I am not satisfied that the lands and harbors known as the Chiriqui grant are the best adapted for coal stations. Several parties claim to be owners of the grant which Mr. Thompson asserts belongs entirely to him and his company.

It is also urged that the title of Mr. Thompson and the company is not valid; that it rested originally upon a grant conferred by the United States of Colombia under certain conditions, which have not been complied with by the grantees; that such coaling stations would result in a useless expenditure of money, involving large expense to the Government in the maintenance of the stations, and probably resulting in their abandonment as being in an expensive, isolated, inconvenient, and unhealthy position. The sovereignty over these lands has undergone changes since the date of the original contract; and it is by no means certain that the obligations said to be conferred under that contract will be ratified and held valid by the government now in power there. It is further reported that land in this lagoon is almost valueless, and that any one settling there and cultivating it acquires title by mere possession. For these and other reasons I have declined to treat for the lands offered by Mr. Ambrose W. Thompson and the corporation in whose name he acts.

Passing from the case of this officer, who, being clothed with discretionary power, refused to carry out the authorization of a certain law, we come next to similar action on the part of Hon. JOHN SHERMAN when Secretary of the Treasury. In volume 19, Statutes at Large, page 362, will be found the following provision:

That the sum of $375.000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated to pay the amount due to mail contractors for mail service performed in the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia, in the years 1859, 1860, 1861, and before said States respectively engaged in war against the United States; and the provisions of 3480 of Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be applicable to the payments therein authorized; Provided, That any such claims which have been paid by the Confederate States government shall not be again paid.

The Secretary of the Treasury was to use his discretion in carrying out the provisions of this law or not as he might think proper, and I have no doubt that in the exercise of such discretion he acted wisely in refusing to use the authority with which he was invested.

At all events, he did refuse to carry out the provisions of that law, and whether such action was wise or unwise is not relevant to this debate. Whether the Secretary of the Navy exercised a sound discretion is not germane to this discussion. But here we have two instances under Republican administrations where the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury have refused to execute laws where they were authorized to use their discretion. I assert, therefore, in view of these facts, that the Postmaster-General, at least on the score of precedents, was fully justified in assuming the position he has taken under the subsidy law.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I renew the amendment which has been withdrawn.

Mr. Chairman, it would have been better, I think, to have postponed this discussion until we had reached the part of the bill to which it relates. But inasmuch as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has raised the question here, I desire to call his attention and the attention of the committee to the provision of the act of the last Congress, and to say that under that provision the Postmaster-General could not do otherwise than he has done.

This is the provision:

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized—

He is authorized, not required. Authorized to do what?—

Authorized to enter into contracts for the transportation of any part of said foreign mail—

When?—

after legal advertisement—

With whom?—

with the lowest responsible bidder—

And with no one else. For how much?—

at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile, on the trip each way, actually traveled.

The Postmaster-General, therefore, could make no apportionment of the $400,000, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. He was required to first advertise, and then, if he proceeded under this act, he could let it only to the lowest bidder. What was the state of things? The Postmaster-General found that there were competing lines of American steamers only on two routes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment for the purpose of asking him a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes; if I can have my five minutes extended so as to answer it.

Mr. DINGLEY. The law assumed, of course, that the Postmaster-General would issue his advertisement, referring to the laws and regulations of the Post-Office Department, asking for proposals for carrying the mails. Now, the question I desire to ask is would it not have been entirely within the power of the Postmaster-General to issue an advertisement saying that no bids would be received or considered that exceeded a certain sum per mile?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not at all; that would not be carrying out the law, which says after "advertisement," and the law fixes the limit, "and then to the lowest bidder." No doubt he could reject any and all bids. But I was proceeding to show the difficulty of carrying out the law. What was the state of things which the Postmaster-General found to exist? There were only two routes where there were competing lines. It is as certain as that the gentleman from Maine is here now, or that I am here, that the other lines would have bid 50 cents a mile. They would have asked the full allowance and claimed that that was the intention of the law.

On the routes where there were two American lines, as on that from San Francisco to China, the two, instead of competing, would almost certainly have combined. If they had not and the service had been let to one line, then the public would have been deprived of half the service they have been getting. The mails would have been carried only half as frequently as when carried by the two lines. It would have taken $1,025,000 to have paid for carrying the mails at the rate of 50 cents a mile under that act. Now, it must be remembered that the Postmaster-General was authorized, not required, to proceed under this act, and as it would have taken $1,025,000, and only $400,000 was appropriated, he thought it best not to advertise for bids at all. He did just as every Postmaster-General since 1848 has done. For under section 4007 of the Revised Statutes every Postmaster-General has had the power to advertise for bids and let contracts for carrying the mails on American vessels, but it has never been done. The only difference in the law is that the limit was raised to 50 cents a mile instead of sea and inland postage, as provided in section 4009 of the Revised Statutes. Having reached the conclusion he did, there was nothing left but to fall back on the law as it has been administered for forty years and offer the sea and inland postage as the highest rate allowed.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there can be but one judgment, and that is, that in this matter the Postmaster-General exercised good business sagacity and a wise discretion, looking to the best interests of the Government and the service. He might, of course, have done what some gentlemen on that side of the House have claimed he ought to have done; he might have spent what money was appropriated and laid the foundation for a claim for twice as much more. They do not say so, but the legitimate conclusion of what they do say is that they would have done it. A Postmaster-General like Brady might and very likely would have expended the whole appropriation in half a year, and obligated the Government for as much more. The present Postmaster-General did not take that course, but, on the contrary, exercised good business discretion, and in that course the country supports him.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. I will take the floor and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask, by unanimous consent, that debate on the pending paragraph be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I propose only to proceed a few minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia that debate on the pending paragraph be closed in ten minutes?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BURROWS. I understood the gentleman to make the statement that if the Postmaster-General had executed the law it would have taken a million and some odd dollars.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A million and twenty-five thousand dollars, or thereabouts.

Mr. BURROWS. Is the gentleman from Ohio aware of the fact that since that time there has been advice, as appears by the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, that there was a mistake made in the compensation of fourteen vessels of foreign register, which would reduce the amount some $600,000?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I take the calculation as made in the report of the Postmaster-General——

Mr. BURROWS. That has ceased to be any guide whatever.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In which he estimates the compensation upon the basis of mileage of steamships plying between the countries named.

Mr. BURROWS. He says American steamships.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The whole question is: Did the Postmaster-General exercise in that regard a wise business discretion? I say he did, and the country supports him in it.

Now a moment on the question of subsidies. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] argues that more compensation should be given to American vessels, but not as a subsidy. There are just two questions here. The first is, What is fair compensation for carrying the mails, disconnected from everything else? The other is, Shall subsidies be paid for maintaining steamship lines? Everything beyond fair compensation for carrying the mails, this, and nothing else, is subsidy, no matter in what guise it comes.

Now, when all disguise is stripped off, this $400,000, or a part of it, was intended as a subsidy, although ostensibly it was given only for carrying mails. Now I say if it is our purpose to establish and maintain steamship lines for commercial purposes we should do it openly, and not under a pretense that it is for something else—not under the disguise of paying for carrying the mails four or five times what the service is worth. If steamship lines are to be paid subsidies in aid of commerce say so and appropriate your $100,000 or $500,000 or $1,000,000 specifically for maintaining steamship lines, as some countries do.

The gentleman from Maine thinks we should pay for the mail service on the basis of mileage alone. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that would not be a proper basis upon which to compute the compensation which should be paid for carrying the mails on sea any more than on land. Suppose we adopted that policy and made mileage alone the basis for computing compensation to railroads for carrying the mails. What reason is there for basing compensation for carrying the mails on mileage alone, regardless of weight, any more than there is on merchandise or express matter? Would we think of paying the railway lines from New York to Chicago, or New York to New Orleans, or New York to San Francisco, on the basis of mileage alone, regardless of quantity or weight? No one would advocate that. The gentleman must know that business is not done on that basis. The carrying trade is not conducted on any such basis, nor is the express business conducted on that principle. There is no difference in fact between mail matter and express or other matter in respect to its transportation.

Distance or mileage, weight and space, combine to make up the cost of transportation, and of these items weight is the most important. On what principle every element that enters into cost should be ignored except mileage I do not see, unless it be that a subsidy can be better disbursed in this way. Upon the basis of mileage alone, a vessel plying between points not distant from each other, say between New Orleans and Havana, no matter what the weight of the mails might be, would not get even the amount of the sea postage, unless the longer lines received greatly more than the sea and inland postage. Or reverse it, and if sea and inland postage were allowed to lines between New Orleans and Havana, vessels plying between San Francisco and China would be entitled on the mileage basis to greatly more than the sea and inland postage. The transportation of the mails is not conducted on that theory by any country, and it ought not to be by this. I am for fair, for liberal compensation for carrying the mails on American vessels, but I do not want to mix up compensation for one service with subsidy for something else.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General:
For compensation to postmasters, $11,700,000.
For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $5,150,000.
For rent, fuel, and light, $495,000.
For office furniture, $25,000.
For miscellaneous and incidental items, $70,000
For free-delivery service, $4,928,531.25.
For stationery in post-offices, $55,000.
For wrapping-twine, $80,000.
For wrapping-paper, $30,000.
For letter-balances, scales, and test-weights, $10,000.
For postmarking and rating stamps, and ink and pads for stamping and canceling purposes, $30,000.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph just read. I desire to make a few observations on this bill, and I regard this as good a point as any other to avail myself of a few minutes, for I shall not consume very much time.

I suppose this bill will have to pass in order to prevent general chaos in the post-office service of the country. The present administration has brought all the departments of the civil service, so far as I can observe, into substantial chaos, but more especially in regard to the Post-Office Department. As an evidence of the grand work which this civil-service reform administration has been doing I want to call attention to a few facts.

The President, in the first place, has assumed an attitude before the country and the people that would not be tolerated for one moment in but two countries in the whole world so far as I can observe or believe. Perhaps Russia or Persia might tolerate his course in regard to the Senate; but neither the Sultan of Turkey nor the Queen of England could keep their positions twenty-four hours if they had assumed the position that the President of the United States has in throwing a black veil of slander around the whole office-holding population of the United States.

But that which I desire to discuss more particularly is the Post-Office Department. If it had been predetermined, if the President and his Cabinet had met in council and determined to inflict punishment upon the people of my district, they could not have more completely succeeded than they have under the administration of the postal service in that district for the last twelve months. We never knew but one time before what it was to be persecuted. We had that experience only once, and that was in the days when men were robbed, arrested, imprisoned, and mobbed or hung for opinion's sake. Since this administration came into power it has been a perfect persecution from the very beginning, and I want to call attention to one or two facts, and before I begin I send to the Clerk's desk to have read a letter which I addressed to the First Assistant Postmaster-General on yesterday, and afterward I will explain what it is.

The Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 29, 1886.

To the FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL:

SIR:—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to allowing the gentleman to publish his letter.

Mr. HISCOCK was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. HOUK.

Mr. HOUK. I wish every gentleman on this floor to hear that letter read.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 29, 1886.

To the FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL:

SIR: As you have seen proper to remove the post-office at Trundle's Cross Roads one mile and a half out of town in order to secure the appointment of a gentleman who has not heretofore been understood to be a Democrat but is a liberal Republican, and thereby inconvenienced three-fourths of the patrons of the office (see map filed by me some time ago), the people in the town and a large majority of those patronizing the office have now appealed to me to see whether or not you would establish a new office in the village for the accommodation of the people, provided they will try to find you a Democrat for postmaster. There is a gentleman—an old and respected citizen, as I understand—who will accept the position for the accommodation of the people who have been raped by your action. Knowing the country well and knowing the people, I can verify the fact that a more unjust and oppressive action could not have been had than depriving them of their post-office, which they had enjoyed for at least seventy-five years. And I now ask in their behalf that a new office be established for their convenience and accommodation, with the distinct understanding that they will furnish an old, high-minded, and honorable citizen for postmaster.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

L. C. HOUK.

Mr. HOUK. Trundle's Cross Roads is a village containing some hundreds of people.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOUK. No, sir, if it is to come out of my time.

Mr. WISE. I only wish to ask if you got a reply to that important communication?

Mr. HOUK. No, sir.

Mr. WISE. I hope you will get one.

Mr. HOUK. Suppose you give it to me. If this House will give me the time I will make all the replies you or anybody else can wish. I promise I will answer it to your entire satisfaction. The village of Trundle's Cross Roads consists of twenty or thirty families. Seven roads concentrate in that village. One of the largest business houses in that county is situated there, and other large business interests are centered there. The church is there; the school is there. But the Department was unable, thank God! to find a Democrat in that whole community. [Laughter.] The First Assistant Postmaster-General has removed the post-office out a mile and a half into a remote corner of the district, over on Pine Ridge. He failed to find a Democrat there, and had to take a Mugwump. [Laughter.]

I want to bring this question before the American people, whether or not men can be persecuted through the officials of this country; whether communities can be persecuted in that way; whether a people must be deprived of their mail or be caused to go clear out of the town and made to travel a mile and a half away from the center of the population for the mail which ought to be carried to their door as it had been for the last seventy-five years?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will my colleague permit me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move a formal amendment in order to ask my colleague a question. Do I understand him to say there was no Democrat in the town or in the delivery that could be appointed?

Mr. HOUK. There was not a Democrat within the town or within half a mile of the town. They had to go away into the Pine Ridges on a by-road, and appoint a Mugwump. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. If there be no Democrat then within the delivery, I want to know by what authority the gentleman proposes to furnish one to the Assistant Postmaster-General when the law requires that the postmaster shall live within the delivery?

Mr. HOUK. I said there was one old man within half a mile of the village, and a Democrat, who had hitherto refused to take the office, but who now, for the good of the community, as I have been advised, agrees to take it provided he can secure the appointment and provided the office is established.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understood you to say there was not one Democrat in the delivery.

Mr. HOUK. There were very few; there are none in the town.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understood the gentleman to say there was not a Democrat in the whole delivery.

Mr. HOUK. I did not say in the whole delivery; for the place to which the post-office was removed is in the delivery. Come again, if you want to. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, a more outrageous, infamous act it is impossible to perpetrate against a community than that of taking a post-office away from where it has been for seventy-five years, out of the town and into the country, for no other purpose than to appoint a man for postmaster whom they expect, being a Mugwump, will materialize and evolute into a full-blooded Democrat some time hereafter. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest to him that some parts of the administration can go a long way to give a Republican an office?

Mr. HOUK. I do not know any reply I can make to that. [Laughter.]

There is another village in my district, where a large business is carried on, where there are three or four stores, and they could not find a Democrat in that village to appoint as postmaster, and they moved the post-office out about three-quarters of a mile, where the people have to travel through a swamp and a laurel thicket to get to it. These are facts; and I do not know any better comment on this civil-service-reform administration.

I advised Mr. Stevenson, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, of this. I went to the trouble to have a map made of Trundle's Cross Roads, showing every road. If any gentleman will take a look at that map he will see it was outrageous to move that post-office.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOUK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WISE. What did you say was the name of the office?

Mr. HOUK. Trundle's Cross Roads.

Mr. WISE. I see that it paid only a revenue of $61 and some cents in a year.

Mr. HOUK. I do not know how much it paid. The question is, whether the body of the people in that locality should be subjected to the inconvenience I have stated?

Mr. WISE. I want the country to understand you are making a big fuss about nothing.

Mr. HOUK. There are thousands of offices in this country that do not pay $12 a year. You would not move an office, as in this case, where there was a Democrat to be appointed. You know it. This is your Democratic civil-service reform.

Mr. CURTIN. You should invoke the Deity to protect the cross-roads in your State.

Mr. HOUK. I never engage in mockery of my Divine Maker, and it would be utter folly to pray against a Democratic administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIN. Provided God was on the side of that administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUK. God does not run post-offices, and I am very certain that if he had anything to do with it, the Democracy would not. [Renewed laughter.] They never run in parallel lines.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOUK. I move to strike out the line just read. I want to get all these facts before this House and before the American people. There is another village in my district and in my own county which does a large business. There are three or perhaps four stores in the village, and from time immemorial the post-office has been there, but this administration has picked it up and carried it over a creek into a kind of swampy place where you have to go through a laurel thicket to get at it. The post-office now is kept in the house of a private citizen who is a millwright, and is usually away from home at work during the day, so that there is nobody to hand out the mail except his children or his wife. In both these cases to which I have called attention the postmasters were men of high character. The postmaster at Trundle's Cross Roads is the peer of any man in Mr. Cleveland's Cabinet for character. [Great laughter.] I do not say that for the purpose of reflecting upon anybody. I state it as a fact, because he is the peer of any man on this floor or elsewhere in character, standing, and business capacity. I suppose that is the reason they removed him—because of his respectability.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I want to say in conclusion is that I do not know how this comes about, unless it be under the influence of a man who paid himself his salary as governor out of the children's school fund of the State two years after his term had expired and when he was a refugee in the swamps of the South.

Mr. MCMILLIN. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOUK. You know just as well as anybody on earth who did it. I have the record, and if you will come around privately I will show it to you.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I only insist that when a man goes to assassinate character—and this is unmitigated assassination—he should have the boldness to do it like a man.

Mr. HOUK. I have the boldness to tell you and show you the facts if you will come to me privately, and the boldness to meet it in any other way.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As a Representative of the State of Tennessee I denounce the statement as false.

Mr. MCMILLIN. No man ought to attempt to do that indirectly which he has not the boldness to do directly. I undertake to say that the man whom he is attempting to reach is the equal of any man he can point to, and I will not, under the rules of this House, say how far he is the superior of that individual [Mr. HOUK] in all that constitutes manhood. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, there are plenty of superiors of the gentleman who makes that reflection marching up and down Pennsylvania avenue now. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side].

Mr. MCMILLIN. And if it were parliamentary, I might say that there are thousands in the penitentiary who are the superiors of the gentleman [Mr. HOUK].

Mr. HOUK. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the superiors of others have been imprisoned, hung, and punished in a thousand ways.

One other word in justice to myself in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. HOUK. One other word, Mr. Chairman. I am entitled to it in reply to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has the floor.

Mr. HOUK. Just one word more. I have said on the stump in Tennessee five hundred times all that I have said here now, coupling the name of the person with it, and I expect during this coming summer to make at least fifty speeches on the stump in which I will give the name and the facts of the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to have the next clause of the bill read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway post-office-car service, $1,808,000.
Railway postal clerks, $4,800,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is treating the former amendment as formal and as having been withdrawn. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 50 and 51 so as to read:
"Railway postal clerks, $4,890,200."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates as compensation of railway postal clerks for the next fiscal year $4,800,000. The Department has asked for $4,877,000. The amendment which I submit increases the amount to $4,890,200. The purpose of this amendment is that the Postmaster-General may have an opportunity, so far as the appropriation will go, to carry out the existing law. The act of 1872 allows to the fourth and fifth class post-office clerks a compensation of $1,200 and $1,400 per annum. That act is re-enacted in the legislation approved July 31, 1882, wherein the same compensation is allowed to these postal clerks of the fourth and fifth classes. By the regulations of the Department under this statute the clerk of the fourth class is receiving $1,150 per annum and the clerk of the fifth class $1,300 per annum. The purpose of my amendment is that the Postmaster-General may give to these employés of the postal service the full amount that the statute contemplates—$1,200 and $1,400 each per annum.

Mr. PETERS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I desire to supplement what has been so well said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] in relation to fourth and fifth class postal clerks by stating that in 1876, by reason of a lack of appropriation, the Postmaster-General decided to cut down the pay of the clerks of the fifth class to $1,300 and the pay of clerks of the fourth class to $1,150. It was supposed that this reduction would be temporary in its nature—for that year only; but for some reason or other the appropriation since that time and until the last year, when the appropriation for the present fiscal year was made, has been insufficient to pay to these postal clerks the salaries which they received prior to 1876 under the law, which allows to fifth-class postal clerks $1,400 and to fourth-class postal clerks $1,200.

Now, I say that in all justice to these men and in view of the requirements of the statute providing their compensation we should increase the appropriation in this bill so that the Postmaster-General may understand it is the wish and will of Congress that these postal clerks shall receive the maximum salary allowed by law. I hope every gentleman who has given attention to this bill and who is in favor of doing justice to these hard-worked employés of the Government will vote in favor of increasing this appropriation to the amount proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I think my friends on the other side will admit—at any rate if I am in error they will correct me when I say—that the act of 1872, classifying this service, fixed or authorized a maximum, but did not require its payment, of $1,400 to fifth-class clerks and $1,200 to fourth-class clerks.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman means the act of 1882.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The act of 1872.

Mr. BINGHAM. The act of 1872 was the original act; the act of 1882 was the grouping together of route agents, postal clerks, and mail-route messengers.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The act of 1872, as I have said, fixed these amounts as the maximum; but since 1876 the maximum has never been paid. I believe I am correct in that statement.

Mr. PETERS and Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In other words, for ten years the maximum actually paid has been $1,150 and $1,300.

It is claimed that in the appropriation act of last year a sum was included which it was calculated would allow the Postmaster-General to pay the maximum of $1,400 and $1,200; but, as has already been shown, when that bill was under discussion in Committee of the Whole the gentleman who had it in charge stated distinctly, in reply to a question which I addressed to him, that this additional sum was intended for the extension of the service which was contemplated during the fiscal year to which the appropriation applied. This disposes of that statement.

The question is, then, shall we now appropriate a sum sufficient to give $1,400 and $1,200 to these clerks, and let it go to the Postmaster-General as an allowance for that purpose? Now, Mr. Chairman, for ten years, as I have said, the maximum actually paid has been $1,300 and $1,150; and that is the amount of appropriation which this bill carries. I wish to call attention to the fact that $1,300 now is better pay for anybody than $1,600 was ten years ago. It will buy more of the necessaries of life.

Mr. BINGHAM. But these men have had ten years more of experience and training, so that they have greater fitness for their work.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That may be quite true; it is an argument entitled to consideration; but does not the increase in the value of money equal the increase which there has been in the qualifications and efficiency of these employés? Within this period of ten years the salaries of Government employés generally have been reduced, while in this case they have not been reduced.

One thing further—it should be remembered that the expenditures of Government must come out of the annual produce of the country, and that $1,300 is equivalent to about four times the average earnings of men who are engaged in the various industries of this country—agricultural, manufacturing, and mining.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman, I know, will be frank enough to state that these men are forced to have two homes; they must have a home at each end of their respective routes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is quite true, and no more than they have had for the past five years. The question now is, shall the salaries be raised when there is such depression of business all over the country and when the tendency has been and I think should be rather to lessen than increase the expenses of the Government?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BURROWS. Before that is done I desire to say when the Clerk commenced reading there was so much confusion in the Hall I lost the run of the bill. I ask therefore to-morrow we shall return to line 39, "Inland transportation by steamboat routes," and line 45, "Inland transportation, railroad routes."

Mr. BLOUNT. We can not afford to go back.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not ask to amend it, but simply to make an inquiry.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. BLOUNT'S motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and had come to no resolution thereon.

KILLING AT CARROLLTON, MISS.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five members of the House of Representatives, to be designated by the Speaker, be appointed, whose duty it shall be to investigate the circumstances and causes attending and resulting in the killing, on the 18th day of March, 1886, in Carrollton, Miss., of a number of colored citizens of said State, and make report thereof to this House.

Resolved, That said committee, when appointed, shall have power to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths, and do all other acts necessary to a free investigation of the subject-matter; that said committee may appoint a subcommittee to visit the State of Mississippi to take testimony and do such other acts as may be necessary in the premises, and that the expenses of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House, not to exceed —— dollars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution which has been read?

Mr. REAGAN. While I am aware the resolution has been offered by request of the Mississippi delegation, yet I am constrained by my respect for the Constitution of the United States to object to it.

Mr. RANDALL. I only ask to inquire into the facts and to report to the House.

Mr. REAGAN. We have no earthly authority to deal with the subject-matter.

Mr. BURROWS. Is not that a substitute for the resolution introduced on this side of the House and objected to?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I ask to refer it to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. REAGAN. I am bound to object to it in any form, because this House has no authority over the subject-matter at all.

Mr. BARKSDALE. On behalf of the Mississippi delegation, I ask the honorable gentleman from Texas to withdraw his objection to the introduction and adoption of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Mississippi delegation do not shrink from any investigation into the occurrence referred to, but on the contrary invite the fullest and most searching examination. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not presented this resolution in opposition to the wishes of the Mississippi delegation, but with their knowledge and consent and really at their suggestion.

Mr. REAGAN. I would gladly do anything which the gentleman or the Mississippi delegation asked me to do, but I am constrained by a sense of duty in this matter to insist on my objection. There are more States than Mississippi involved.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why should the gentleman who objects to the consideration of the proposition insist upon arguing it?

Mr. REAGAN. I was only answering a question.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 31, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Delaware, Ohio, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of public improvements, and especially for the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Jackson, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of Frank W. Tubbesing, of Atlanta, Ga., for a pension; and as his case is so curious and his petition is written by himself I shall be glad to have it read for the information of the Senate. I do not care about its being put in the RECORD if anybody objects, but I think the poor fellow ought to be allowed to tell his story, and see if we can get a pension for him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Petition of Frank W. Tubbesing, of Atlanta, Ga., No. 5 Orange street.

To the Congress of the United States:

Eight years ago I entered my claim for invalid pension through the law firm of William Conard & Co., post-office box 715, Washington. D. C.

I served from January, 1863, to the surrender of Appomattox Court House, 1865, and was during this period twice severely wounded; once at the right side of my head, where a deep indentation remains, and which physicians declare to be very dangerous, especially as age advances; the other wound is on my left leg, and breaks frequently open in a running sore.

From 1866 to 1869 I served in the Third United States Artillery, stationed at Raleigh, N. C. The latter years of this service I was employed as messenger at the headquarters of the late General Meade at Atlanta, Ga. This command remained in the South until my discharge in 1869, at Saint Augustine, Fla. I settled near Atlanta, Ga., on a little farm, and in consequence lost all knowledge of my old comrades of the time of war by whom to make the required proof.

In July, 1885, I received a communication from the acting commissioner, stating that my claim, No. 342962, was rejected on the ground that the records of the War Department did not furnish evidence of my wounds.

I have proved by several eminent physicians the nature of my wounds, and by the sworn affidavits of the most prominent citizens my character for truth and veracity. A petition was signed and sent to the Hon. N. J. HAMMOND by the leading attorneys of my county and several others of Atlanta, praying that Congress would decide my cause and grant my humble petition for a pension.

My wounds are painful; only strong opiates alleviate my sufferings; age advances very fast, and I am entirely unable to make a living by manual labor.

The late Hon. A. H. Stephens, who knew personally my condition, procured me in 1883 the position as United States storekeeper and gauger, but I was dismissed at the change of the administration. My record at the Treasury Department will prove that I filled my duties as an honorable man.

Necessity forces me to lay this petition before Congress. My attorneys have withdrawn, because I was unable to pay their advance fee.

On the 6th instant my wife and myself were stricken down by typhoid fever. On the 9th instant she died and left me a suffering, childless cripple, whose days may be very few.

Hoping that Congress will look favorably on this petition and grant to me the needed pension—I offer that every fact stated before can be fully established by me—

I am, gentlemen, your most humble servant,

FRANK W. TUBBESING.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In moving the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions I wish to invite the early attention of that committee to this case, and to say that I am informed, and believe, that this poor soldier, after he had ended his service in the Army, was appointed, as he says in the petition, a storekeeper and gauger under the internal-revenue system I suppose, at Atlanta, in Georgia, upon the recommendation of the late Alexander H. Stephens, but the remorseless fate of politics (and how the poor fellow could have had any politics that would have hurt anybody I do not know) has turned him a helpless and a crippled soldier out of the service of the United States, in which he says there was no complaint of his conduct. Under those circumstances I hope the Committee on Pensions will take an early opportunity to see whether he has got any other claim upon the gratitude of his country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present resolutions signed by C. A. Chapman, secretary of the Vermont Merino Sheep-Shearing Association. The resolutions are in the nature of a memorial on the subject of the tariff on wool and the competition of shoddy manufactures against the honest products of the country, &c. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Charles Tobias, late a private in Company K, Eleventh Regiment Vermont Volunteers, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. I present resolutions signed by Hon. D. K. Cartter, chairman, and James C. Dulin, secretary, adopted by a meeting of a large number of citizens held in this city, expressive of their sense of the proposed action of Congress upon the subject of the common schools of the District. I move that the accompanying letter of Judge Cartter and the resolutions be printed as a document, and be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Stuart and Boone, in the State of Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of What Cheer, Iowa, remonstrating against the repeal or amendment of the mechanics' lien law now in force in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Vancouver, Wash.; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, VANCOUVER BOARD OF TRADE,
Vancouver, Wash., March 19, 1886.

At a regular meeting of the Vancouver Board of Trade, held this day, there was unanimously adopted the following memorial to Congress on the question of the tariff on lumber and coal:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Board of Trade of the city of Vancouver, Wash., respectfully represent that two of the leading industries of this Territory are the mining of coal and the manufacture of lumber.

That these industries employ a large number of men, a large amount of capital, and a large number of American ships.

That the British territory to the north of us is also a coal and timber producing country.

That its coal mines and forests are close to tide water, and consequently can be more economically utilized than the mines and forests of this Territory.

That the products of the mines and forests of this Territory have to be hauled over railways from 15 to 60 miles before reaching navigable waters. That a number of such railways are now in operation to the Columbia River and Puget Sound, and others are now in process of construction. That two such railways are now being built in Clarke County, Washington Territory, designed to bring to the wharves of Vancouver and La Camas large quantities of coal, saw-logs, piles, and spars. That these railways will incidentally, by furnishing cheap transportation, open up to settlement large areas of valuable agricultural and mineral lands.

Your memorialists further represent that by reason of the superior economic situation of the mines and forests of British Columbia, and by reason of the fact that large quantities of coal are brought to our ports in foreign bottoms as ballast at merely nominal charges for freight, the present tariff on the articles mentioned is necessary to enable the coal miners and lumbermen and the owners of American coasting vessels to have a reasonable margin of profit on their transactions.

Your memorialists therefore respectfully pray that the present import duty on lumber and coal be allowed to remain as a part of our tariff laws.

I, W. Byron Daniels, secretary of the Vancouver Board of Trade, hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original memorial adopted by said board as above stated.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and the seal of said board, the date first above written.

[SEAL.] W. BYRON DANIELS, Secretary.

Mr. GORMAN presented a petition of the Chesapeake Bank of Baltimore, Md., praying that certain internal-revenue taxes paid in error be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Sarah H. Wood, of Baltimore, Md., praying that the proceeds of her deposit in the Bank of Louisiana, taken under General Order 202 from that bank in 1863, be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JACKSON presented the petition of Friedman Brothers and other citizens of Chattanooga, Tenn., praying for the passage of Senate bill 1636, to reduce the rate of postage upon seeds, scions, bulbs, and plants; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition signed by 8 male citizens of Geneva, N. Y., praying for the extension to women of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition signed by 72 persons and firms representing the book and stationery trade of New York city, praying for the speedy passage of a national and uniform bankruptcy law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Boulder, Colo., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Boulder, Colo., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Washington, Knightsville, Peru, and Elkhart, in the State of Indiana, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Spencer County, Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who served in the Army and Navy of the United States during the war of the rebellion and to their widows and orphans, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Bridgeton, Parke County, Indiana, and of Local Assembly No. 299, of the State of Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill providing for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory to settlement, &c.; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Huntington, Ind., praying for the passage of a joint resolution submitting to the several States and Territories a proposition to so amend the national Constitution as to protect women in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Wabash, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented resolutions adopted by the Chicago Live Stock Exchange, remonstrating against certain provisions of the bill to regulate the transportation of live stock which require the feeding and watering of cattle in transit every twelve hours; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of 60 members of the Knights of Labor of Carmi, Ill., and a memorial of 21 members of the Knights of Labor of Port Byron, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1333) for the relief of William H. Randle, of Nashville, Tenn., reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon.

A bill (H. R. 4122) granting a pension to Mary E. Snow; and A bill (H. R. 1471) increasing the pension of Andrew J. Hill.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1267) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Lou Gobright McFalls, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on the Library, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress be printed, and that 500 additional copies, with covers, be printed for distribution by the Librarian.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the National Academy of Sciences for 1885, with its appendices, be printed in the usual octavo form, but that the eight accompanying memoirs be printed in quarto form, and that 4,500 additional copies of the report and memoirs be printed; of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the National Academy of Sciences.

GREELY POLAR EXPEDITION REPORT.

Mr. HAWLEY. From the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 23) for the printing of the report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, Grinnell Land, by First Lieut. A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, acting signal officer, I make a favorable report. We report a substitute for the joint resolution, and ask that the original resolution be indefinitely postponed and the substitute adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute reported will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Concurrent resolution for printing the report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, Grinnell Land, by First Lieut. A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, acting signal officer.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, Grinnell Land, by First Lieut. A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, acting signal officer, be printed, and that 4,500 additional copies, with the necessary illustrations, be printed; 1,250 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 750 copies for distribution by the Signal Service Bureau.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate joint resolution No. 23 will be postponed indefinitely.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to move that the bill (S. 882) to equalize the pay of graduates of the Naval Academy be taken from the Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 2015) for the relief of the Chesapeake Bank, of Baltimore, Md.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 2016) for the relief of Napoleon B. McKay; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2017) for the relief of James T. Peale; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SABIN introduced a bill (S. 2018) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 2019) for the relief of William Shannon, of North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 2020) granting a pension to Addie L. Macomber; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2021) for the relief of Edward E. Tinsdale; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Pensions to this bill. This is the application of a soldier who has served the United States about ten years in the volunteer and regular force, who since his discharge has been disabled, losing both eyes and both arms. He has a family to support, and either he must go to the poorhouse or the Government must make some provision for him. I also submit papers to accompany the bill, which I move be referred with the bill to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 2022) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 59) explanatory of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, relative to the readjustment of the salaries of certain postmasters; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask for the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia inform the Senate whether any of the said commissioners is now stockholder or director or attorney of either of the street horse-railways or national banks of the District of Columbia, or of the Washington Gaslight Company; also, if not now, whether heretofore either of them has been stockholder, director, or attorney of either of said corporations; and, if so, when he ceased to be such stockholder, director, or attorney, as aforesaid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

RECLAMATION OF TEXAN AND MEXICAN STOCK.

Mr. COKE submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas the boundary line between the Republics of the United States and Mexico in much of its length divides a grazing and stock-growing country, which lies on each side thereof; and

Whereas horses and cattle may and do cross said line at will, the same interposing no obstruction thereto; and

Whereas in the absence of some treaty provision between the two countries for the reclamation of stock thus crossing said boundary line the citizens of the two countries are liable to become embroiled: Therefore, for the purpose of averting such complications as, in consequence thereof, may ensue between the two countries,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to bring the subject to the attention of the Mexican Government, with a view to negotiations between the two countries looking to an agreement under which the citizens of both may be protected in making reclamation of their property which may have crossed the boundary line.

Mr. COKE. In order to show the importance of the resolution, I will read to the Senate from a letter received by me bearing on the subject. The writer says:

MY DEAR SIR: Pardon the liberty I take in addressing you at this time, but I feel that a question of great moment to many of your Texan constituents and to other American citizens justifies me in doing so.

You can not be otherwise informed than that upon this border (the Rio Grande)—

This gentleman writes from the Rio Grande, on the Mexican side—

there are constant troubles between the American stockmen and the Mexican officials, growing principally out of the fact that Texan stock (horses and cattle) are constantly crossing the narrow and shallow stream which divides the two countries. When this Texas stock get upon this side of the river—.

That is, the Mexican side—

they are seized and immediately confiscated by the local Mexican authorities, although their owners live in many instances within a stone's throw of the range these cattle are seized on. During the past fall and winter a large number of Texas stock drifted in this way into Mexico, and now that the spring drive is soon to be made by the stockmen, it is highly probable that serious trouble will occur over the recovery by Texan owners of stock on this side of the Rio Grande. The stockmen assert the intention to take their stock peaceably if possible, forcibly if necessary.

Now, it strikes me that the Mexican treaty at present before Congress for ratification should not be adopted without some clause giving to the American owners the right to reclaim their property on Mexican territory. It may be asserted that they now have that right, but I can say that it is an impossibility for an American owner to recover stolen or strayed stock from Mexican holders. The courts here positively refuse to do anything in the matter, and it is a well-known fact that even prominent Mexican officials of this section are to-day in possession of valuable American horses stolen from Texas, which they refuse to deliver, even when every proof of ownership has been presented by the American claimant.

This letter is from a gentleman well known to me and to others in this Chamber as one of the highest character and more than ordinary intelligence. He has no interest in this question as a stock-grower or dealer in stock; he simply states facts which he thinks ought to engage the attention of our Government—an opinion in which I believe this Senate will concur. I have read the letter in order that the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom I shall ask that the resolution be referred, may see the importance of giving the subject as early attention as is practicable.

I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. CALL. I wish to give notice that on Friday morning, at the close of the morning hour, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to take from the table the resolution offered by me in favor of the forfeiture of the land grants to railroads not completed within the time specified in the grants for the purpose of submitting a few remarks upon the resolution.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. 277) for the relief of James M. Lowry;

A bill (H. R. 6663) for the relief of Thomas P. Westmoreland;

A bill (H. R. 4009) for the relief of Ann B. Hubbard, administratrix; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 115) providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John F. Slater.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the morning business is closed, and the Calendar is now in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the bill to increase the efficiency of the Army be now placed before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, the pending question being on Mr. HALE'S motion to strike out section 2 of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I did not intend on yesterday when I closed my remarks to continue this discussion any further, nor have I any desire at this time to protract it at any considerable length. I was in hopes that by this time I could have had a vote on the bill, and had the sense of the Senate in reference to the proposition that has been discussed before it. But it seems that there is no way to satisfy the desire on the part of some Senators to procrastinate this struggle. I do not feel called upon to make answer to anything that was said yesterday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] with regard to this bill; but, however, feeling that I am not called upon to do so, I will for his personal gratification reply to one or two remarks that he made personal to myself.

It would not do for me to enter into the field of sarcasm and there measure blades with him, especially in reference to the character of sarcasm indulged in by that Senator. Sarcasm, sir, is of two kinds, one that carries the evidence with it of splenetic feeling and not coming from a great, massive intellect and a generous heart. There is sarcasm, however, that is sometimes worthily indulged in in debate. This that I have reference to is not of the latter class.

I have read carefully over—I had not the opportunity to do so until yesterday evening—what I said in answer to the Senator from Colorado, and for the life of me I can not find a single sentence or remark that should have called forth from him the character of remark that he uttered on the Senate floor on yesterday. It is true, sir, I did say when I was speaking of the armies returning from the contest for the preservation of this Union that in that great array I did not see the face of the Senator. That seems to have given offense. It was true. I did not see his face. I merely stated a fact. I did not mean to criticise the Senator on account of his not being one of those who entered the Army, for there are many good and true men who were not in the Army. A great majority of the people of this country were not in the Army. I am an older man than he; I believe so at least; and if on account of his age or indisposition or from any other cause he was not engaged, that is no cause of criticism on my part, and I do not desire to criticise either him or anybody else for that reason. If that gave offense and caused him to utter what he did, then I am guilty.

But the remark that I desire to reply to especially was one that was calculated to wound the feelings of almost any Senator, when made in the manner in which it was uttered by that Senator. He referred to the urbanity of manner exhibited by myself, my courtesy toward Senators. He is the first Senator on this floor who has ever complained of my course of conduct so far as courtesy toward him was concerned—the first man. I do not claim that I am more courteous than other Senators, nor even that I am as courteous, yet that is the first complaint that any Senator ever made of that character against me. I do not claim that I have all the graces nor that I would make a Chesterfield, as would the Senator; but at the same time I do not feel that that was a fair criticism upon my course. Let that go, however, and from this time forward I shall greet the Senator as the Chesterfield of the Senate Chamber.

Ah, sir, I desire, however, to say in no unpleasant words, I hope, that when the Senator referred to me as a soldier and said that would not be forgotten by this Senate, that I was determined it should not be forgotten, that I was constantly parading that fact before the country—if that character of remark had fallen from the lips of some one North who, during the war, nursed his wrath to keep it warm against Union soldiers, from some man who was known then by the cognomen of "copperhead," from some man whose hatred grew and still grew against the Union soldiers, I could have understood it; but for that kind of sneering sarcasm to come from a Republican, representing a Republican constituency, was unworthy a Senator representing a loyal State. On the opposite side of the Chamber, where are men who were arrayed in the contest against the Union arms for a division of this grand nation—they have more respect for a man who was a soldier and stood up face to face against them than to insinuate in any such low and despicable way as this. Why, sir, no confederate officer ever deigned to offer or would offer such a remark or insinuation against any soldier on this side of the Chamber. Therefore I say to the Senator from Colorado that this remark did wound my feelings; this remark was not of the character that should come from a friend.

True, sir, I did do what little I could for this country. I did help preserve that flag which shelters him; I did help protect his property; I did help protect his rights; I did help keep this Union together that he might be an honorable Senator, while he slept beneath his own roof in the quiet of his own home. And for that reason am I to be criticised by a Republican in this Senate?

I say to the Senator that I am not in his way nor in the way of any of his friends. His insinuation about my aspirations was without foundation. I have no aspirations other than to represent my constituency honestly and fairly; none other than to occupy my seat honorably, and I never have had any other, no matter what may have been said by others. Why, sir, when the seat you fill (pointing to the President of the Senate), honorable as it is, was offered to me with unanimity on the part of this side of the Senate Chamber I declined it. What evidence is there to justify its being thrown in my teeth that my aspirations are being interfered with in reference to this bill or the debate on it? What justification is there for such insinuations? I ask for nothing; I want nothing.

Mr. President, the Senator said:

> I have yet to learn that in the history of the world the men who have made their mark in legislative life, in the civil forum, have received their education on the tented field.

That is true. It is true, Mr. President, in regard to the soldier who passes years and years of his time in the field while others are in their offices, while others have an opportunity of informing themselves in reference to legislation, that the opportunities of those at home are better than of those in the field. I agree to all that; but yet I have found men in my life and in my travels who have been in the cloister and in their offices and chambers for years and years, and yet failed to make statesmen out of themselves.

When he said I was not a statesman, I knew that much myself; and I am sorry that some other men do not even know that much about themselves. A statesman! Daniel Webster was a statesman. He was a Cabinet officer once. Does that prove that every man who is or may have been a Cabinet officer is a Daniel Webster? I think not. It will not do for men who by some good fortune have, to the surprise and astonishment of others, been taken and others left behind to imagine on that account that they have all the wisdom in the world. If they do, they may be mistaken.

Statesman! I am willing to agree that the Senator is a statesman if that will do him any good. My agreeing to it, however, would not make it so; yet I will agree to it merely for his accommodation.

There have been soldiers, however, not inside of this Senate Chamber, perhaps, but in history from the time that wars have been made, who have not only been soldiers but have been statesmen. Of course they are dead; none of them are living now, perhaps; yet there are many statesmen who have been civilians who are dead, and many yet living who never will be statesmen, and never can be except in their own fevered imagination.

Further, the Senator said that I assumed to know more about military affairs than any other man. Why, Mr. President, I do not know that I have made any pretense of that character. Because I am chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs I have been called into the discussion of subjects connected with military affairs occasionally, and on certain occasions I have alluded to what I have seen in my own experience for the purpose of illustrating a proposition; but at the same time I have never assumed that I knew more than other people about military affairs. I might possibly know more than the Senator from Colorado, yet that would not be saying very much for myself.

But that was not all, Mr. President. I am saying this now because I understand this thing perfectly; I am not deceived; the Senator is mistaken if he thinks I am a child; he is mistaken if he thinks I can not see some things, dark as my vision may be. He attempted in every possible way yesterday to insinuate that I had said certain things in this Senate Chamber alluding to a certain gentleman of high character, far away from here now, in connection with this bill, in what I said in regard to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. Why did he lug that in? What has that to do with the proposition to add five thousand men to the Army? Yet it was insisted upon and insinuated, and even the insinuation made that I had stricken it out of my speech; that is, he said we must take the RECORD, but we know how RECORDS are made up. Everybody understood that.

Now, why does he persist and why has it been persisted in on this floor that I am trying to strike at somebody outside of this Chamber? I say now, once for all, to that Senator that I made no such allusion, that the man was not in my mind, that I had no such intention, nor can my language be construed or tortured into any such meaning as that. What I said was in reference to Senators and in reference to the backing of Senators by Senators, not in reference to anybody outside, for I do not deal in that character of insinuations. I will say further to the Senator, and desire him to understand it and have the notice now, that all the attempts made by Senators here in this Chamber to cause a quarrel or ill-feeling between the gentleman alluded to and myself will be a failure. He and I are better friends than these gentlemen who are trying to make us enemies. That is all in reference to that; and this little play and this little game is too small a thing for Senators to engage in who wish to deal openly and fairly.

The Senator said he had a right to argue this bill. So say I. I agree to that. Every Senator has a right to oppose it if he chooses, and I never have complained at opposition to any bill where it was legitimate. The only complaint I made was of the insinuations made against me and against the committee that reported this bill having some hidden motive in view in reporting it. That was the objection I made to the argument, and not to the fact of opposition so far as the statements made were true and were facts. I made no objection to that, nor do I.

Now, Mr. President, I dismiss that part of it, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a very few moments to one of the principal applications of this bill, as I desire it to be amended before it is passed, to the machinery of the Army, and then I am done. The statement that no recommendations have been made by Executive Departments in reference to this measure is without foundation. As I read yesterday, there is the recommendation of the Secretary of War indorsing the recommendation of the Lieutenant-General of the Army and of the ex-General of the Army. What is that? I desire to call the attention of Senators to it for a few moments. It is that there should be two additional companies attached to each regiment of infantry, those companies being numerically one hundred men each. That for twenty-five regiments is easily calculated.

There is the recommendation. There is what we propose. Now, why? It is that these twenty-five infantry regiments may be organized the same as the artillery and cavalry. How are they organized? The ten regiments of cavalry are organized into thirty battalions, three battalions to a regiment, twelve companies to a regiment. How is it in the artillery? The five regiments of artillery are organized with twelve companies to a regiment, making three battalions, having two majors in each of the regiments of artillery and of cavalry. We have adopted the drill for the artillery, cavalry, and infantry alike. In former years, as is well known to everybody who has studied Scott's Tactics or Hardee's Tactics or any other tactics, the drill of the infantry, cavalry, and artillery was different entirely. Now the drill is the same in all arms of the service, so that a company of artillery can move the same as a company of infantry, and vice versa. Their movements are the same. They can march, move, drill, and perform all the evolutions in the same way and manner. Now the proposition is and has been for several years that the infantry arm of the service should be put on a basis with the cavalry and artillery arms of the service. How? That it should have twelve companies in each regiment, making three battalions to a regiment, so as to equalize the whole service and give it efficiency. That is the proposition which has been made by the Secretary of War and by the generals of the Army, a proposition that I should like to see carried out. Of course if this amendment should be adopted that machinery would be necessary provided Congress agrees to make that arm of the service the same as the other arms of the service.

Now, let me go a little further, and let us see whether or not that would increase the efficiency of the service. I call the attention of any Senator who may be opposed to the bill to this proposition. You would have twenty-five regiments of infantry, and each regiment would have twelve companies and three battalions. You could thereby have eight companies at all times in the regiment, full, complete—the companies ready to move at a moment's warning. Instead of having three fragments, and having it all in fragments as it is now, you would have two battalions in complete order, and by transferring men from one battalion to the other you would have two complete, full battalions at all times, and have the framework of the third battalion to be filled up by the recruits. In that way you would have twenty-five regiments of eight companies to the regiment ready to move at the tap of the drum. Will any man say that would not increase the efficiency of our service? I want to know if there is a man who understands anything about military affairs, as much so as these gentlemen who have opposed the bill, who will tell me that that would not be a move in the direction of the efficiency of the service of the Army of the United States.

And yet we are told that this is simply for extravagance, and that is all there is in this proposition. Why, Mr. President, that is not so; and when I say that I do not mean it offensively, but I mean that there is no truthful basis for the statement. The efficiency of our cavalry and artillery has been increased in that very way; and yet they are not what they ought to be; and why? Because the recruits that have been drawn for the purpose of filling up the regiments are mainly for the infantry, and the cavalry is kept up with difficulty because it is a hard service; men wear out and horses wear out; so that the efficiency of our cavalry is not what it ought to be; but by this organization which I have mentioned it is much more efficient than it was prior to the adoption of this organization, and so is your artillery, if there is any use for that at the present time.

I will not go into the question as to the immediate use, for that seems to me to be so absurd as far as argument is concerned that I care not to reply to it further than to say that there is no use for our artillery standing in the forts everywhere. Of course there is no use for artillery except in time of war, except for drill and keeping forts and preparing them and being in garrison, drilling, exercising, and putting themselves in condition. That is all the use they are. It is all the use for your fortifications to have them there, not for the purpose of shooting anybody to-day, but so that the machinery may be kept in order and everything prepared so that you may be ready for service if required.

The arguments made in reference to this proposition are the character of arguments that are made by men not well understanding the proposition, but thinking they do know more about it than other people, and at the same time forcing their views upon the country in antagonism to a proposition that is worthy at least of fair and just consideration when it has been recommended by all the departments connected with the Army for years and years gone by.

Now, Mr. President, I hope that we shall get a vote on this measure as soon as possible. When I say that, I do not wish Senators to understand that I want them cut off from anything they may desire to say. Oh, no, sir! There are friends of this bill here whom I should be glad to have say something to the Senate, men who know something about this bill, men on the Military Committee, so that the Senate may understand that this bill is not merely the bill of some individual for his own aggrandizement or something of that character, for it is no such thing and for no such purpose. Who ever heard my humble self on this floor accuse a man who reported a bill of having some motive besides that which was expressed in the bill?

Mr. President, I will not reply further to insinuations of that kind, but will ask the indulgence of the Senate in reference to this bill that it may at least be brought to a conclusion at some time soon. I have many reasons for that. I have other matters that I desire to take some notice of and look after, and for that reason I am anxious that we should come to some conclusion in reference to this proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to section 14 of this bill, which I understand does not in any way relate to the efficiency of the Army. This section proposes to give the commissioned officers of the Army the benefits of an act passed on the 15th of May, 1872. I think this question has been discussed once or twice in past years, and for myself I think it is rather a dangerous provision to insert in the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that that is entirely separate from the proposition to increase the efficiency of the Army, except that the committee thought it might benefit some of the younger officers by having their money placed in the Treasury of the United States, where it would not be liable or likely to be spent for naught. For that reason it was put in. But there is no one on the committee who is particularly a stickler for that provision. I do not desire to say anything about the views of the committee, but that section was put in at the suggestion of the Paymaster-General, and not on account of anything that was brought otherwise to the notice of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. This provision, as the Senator is aware, allows 4 per cent. on all deposits and allows a redeposit once in three years. Of course when the original act was passed the Government of the United States was very largely in debt, having a large amount of indebtedness then to pay. I do not see very well how the Government under the existing condition of our Treasury can reimburse itself if it allows officers to make these deposits.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; that is a matter for the Senate to decide. I have no particular feeling about the section.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will move to strike out the fourteenth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not now in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I give notice that I will offer it when it is in order.

Mr. LOGAN. While I am up, I desire to call the Senator's attention to one matter that he suggested yesterday and perhaps I did not make myself clear about it at the time; I thought of it afterwards. That is in reference to the mileage of officers. After thinking over what he had said, I thought perhaps he understood me to mean that all officers traveling on railroads should receive mileage whether traveling with troops or not. That is not the intention of that section of the bill. It does not apply where for instance a regiment is traveling under orders and the commanding officer is with the regiment. It is where, for instance, a recruiting officer, a paymaster, an inspector, or an officer ordered on a particular character of duty, not commanding troops as a staff officer, has to travel on a land-grant railroad, he shall not suffer thereby in his pay. Any commanding officer of a regiment traveling alone or traveling in that way would be entitled to his pay. The provision applying to the land-grant railroads of course should be continued where he is moving troops in large bodies—companies, battalions, regiments, or anything of that kind. It is not intended, as I understand at least, to apply to that character of transportation; but only when they are sent on duty. A regiment ordered to be removed is not considered in military parlance as being ordered on any particular duty except the general duty that they are expected to perform under the law.

Mr. ALLISON. Detached duty?

Mr. LOGAN. Not detached duty; but officers on special duty, for instance paymasters, men not moving with troops. It can be so worded as to make it clear if there is any doubt about it.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question, which I suppose has not much to do with this bill, but this is as good a time to ask it as any. I think the discussion last year made the whole country surprised at the condition of the Articles of War in time of peace, their operation, the injustice and irregularity, and impropriety of the conduct of courts-martial in time of peace. There was a general desire that a new series of Articles of War should be prepared and adopted by legislation whenever a convenient time came for it. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether his committee is likely to deal with that question at some time during the present session. Of course it is not in reference to the present bill, but the question seems to be a proper one now.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a proper question, and I should like very much if we could take it up and deal with it. I can not say that we will or will not, for really I can not answer the question. I would desire to do so if it is possible that we can do so.

I will say also to the Senator, that if the Military Committee do not understand the questions before them, as it would seem they do not, it might not be well for them to undertake it. It might be well for some other committee that might understand it better.

Mr. HOAR. Who do not know anything about it? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. I will say, however, to the Senator that that question will be before the committee during this session of Congress. What they may do on it I can not say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I stated at the conclusion of the remarks which I made the other day on this bill that I felt some constraint about speaking upon it at all, because of the fact that the Senator from Illinois seemed to impute personal motives to any one who opposed it, and some remarks that he made, some of which were published in the RECORD and some of which were not, are of a kind that I hope he would be glad if he had not said. Any insinuation that a man's calling or business has any influence on his vote or position as a Senator is unworthy of the Senate and of the Senator who makes it, I do not care how little he thinks of himself. I never said anything here or elsewhere disrespectful to the Senator from Illinois. When I spoke of certain armies having marched down Pennsylvania avenue at the close of the war, I did not refer to the persons who commanded them, but only of the armies themselves, using the names of the men who were familiar in the public mind as commanders for the purpose of designating the armies themselves. I did not think of the Senator from Illinois. If I had, I beg to assure him I would have mentioned him, if he had only commanded a corporal and a private.

The question whether he commanded sixty thousand or eighty thousand men on that occasion for a temporary purpose was something that I did not know anything about; but I can say here now, entirely irrespective of any personal feeling I may have toward the Senator, that I have on all occasions as I shall do hereafter taken my fair share of his reputation as a volunteer soldier. The country recognizes what he knows very well and what he does not need to constantly refer to here, that he was the most eminent of all the volunteer soldiers of the Union Army. Nothing that I could say would add to that statement. In my judgment that puts him on the highest possible pinnacle, and if I were ten thousand times his friend I could not say more for him than that.

But, Mr. President, I will not even dignify the personalities of this debate by saying that I am a friend of the Senator from Illinois, because the question of personal regard has no place in the official business transacted in this Chamber.

I came to the discussion of this bill with a sincere purpose as far as in me lay to subserve the public interest. I represent a people who read more newspapers than any other similar aggregation of people on the American continent, and they know more swiftly and more completely what is going on in this Chamber than any other people in the United States. They are an ambitious people and a jealous people, and they hold me, as they hold all their representatives here and elsewhere, to a strict account for what they do and for what they do not do, acts of omission and commission alike. It was in view of that responsibility, which is always with me, as I have no doubt with every other member of this body, that I have spoken upon this bill. In view of considerations of that kind, even so great a personality as that of the Senator from Illinois shrinks into absolute nothingness. It is not his bill; it is not the bill of the Military Committee; it lost its distinctive and personal character the moment it was reported to the Senate. It is the bill of the Senate. It is open to amendment, to debate, to criticism, to denunciation, and to whatever else it may be justly entitled; and that liberty which any Senator can take in the debate is governed by his sense of duty and by the ordinary proprieties which pertain to this Chamber, and which are only the proprieties that obtain among gentlemen everywhere.

I said that I thought this bill was unwise. I think so still. I shall regret exceedingly if the Senate do not take the same view of it; but when I have discharged my duty the consequences to me are no more than the consequences to any other citizen of the Republic. When I have done my duty I am personally indifferent as to what may become of the bill, for the responsibility attaches to the Senate and not to me.

I call the attention of the Senate, at the risk of repeating myself to some extent, to the fact that now, at a time when perhaps the country is more profoundly at peace than it ever has been, when there is not a single cloud in the horizon, when the country is considering its obligations to the soldiers of the late war in new lights, and when it is considering what it shall do for exterior defense, for the purpose of putting upon the sea a flotilla which shall be equivalent to all demands upon it—at this particular time of all times here is a proposition to increase the pay of the military establishment of the country to an extent of over $6,000,000.

Mr. President, if we are going to have fortifications, had we not better save a little money to build them with? If we are going to have a navy, had we not better refrain from increasing the salaries of an establishment already great, in order that we may have the money to build it with? If we are going to pay the debts overdue, daily being proved before the Departments, to the men who actually rendered military service in the late struggle, had we better not save some money out of the revenues of the country in order that we may pay those debts?

Is there any demand anywhere, except from an interested source, that we shall add to the current expenses of the Army more than $3,000,000 a year? I do not advocate, as the Senator from Illinois said that I did, the reduction of the pay of the American Army to the pay of the British army or of the German army; but I did say and I say now that if we are going to touch the Army we can better afford to touch it in the way of cutting down the pay than we can in the direction of increasing it.

It was stated by the Senator from Illinois in a somewhat labored way that the increase of five thousand men in the Army will not increase the expense more than a million and a half dollars a year. We pay about $26,000,000 a year for the support of twenty-five thousand men, rank and file. We not only pay them their $13 a month each and the longevity pay which is added by reason of length of service, but we clothe them and we feed them and we furnish them medical attendance and medicines, hospitals in which they are treated, barracks and quarters in which they are sheltered, and we transport them from place to place, and we maintain at Saint Louis, Chicago, and New York and various other places in the Union great depots of supplies, costing enormous sums of money to keep them up by way of current repairs, and we add every year from a half million to three-quarters of a million dollars to the cost of the shelter, under the name of forts, of arsenals, of barracks, and so on, which go to make up the cost of this military establishment, and which is increased in proportion as we increase the number of men in the Army.

There is no use in saying that if we add five thousand men we do not add to the expense proportionately. General Sheridan is quoted in regard to it in a way that reminds me of the story of the Irishman who, when told he could save half his fuel by purchasing a certain stove, replied, "Then by buying two I can save it all." His idea is that if we put five thousand more men in the Army we shall so utilize the things we have already got that this will not cost us very much additional; but there is no warrant for that, because, as five is a multiple of twenty-five, the amount of clothing to be kept in store, of rations, and so on for the purpose of maintaining these people will be increased in proportion. Of course the number of barracks, already scant, will require to be increased, and in every way, with the single exception of the salaries of officers, that increase will represent the cost which the Government now has to pay for the service of a private soldier.

Mr. President, these five thousand men, unless we shut our eyes wholly and entirely to what we know the cost of the present establishment is, can not be less than $4,000,000 per year. Now $4,000,000 is not a great deal of money. If the object to be attained were of sufficient importance, the appropriation, of course, ought to go without objection. I have said heretofore all I care to say upon that point. I believe that now is not the time, if the time shall ever come, when we want to increase the number of enlisted men in the Army.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], with that eye to proportion which is characteristic of him, says we want to increase the number of battalions in the regiments in order to make three to a regiment in place of two as now. It would have been in order I think for him to have suggested that instead of increasing the number of men in order to make three battalions to a regiment we should simply reduce the number of the regiments. But it is one of the peculiarities of the situation which has grown out of a constantly increasing surplus in the Treasury, or at all events out of the enormous sums there, that every proposition which is made is to level up, not to level down—that every proposition which is made here by legislation is to increase the expense of the Government and not to diminish it, and that, too, not in directions called for by the growth of the country, but in directions which are indicative of extravagance.

Now I call attention to the fact that in this bill there is not one single line which diminishes a privilege, which reduces an expense; and not only that, there is not a single section but what increases expense—not one. There is not a proposition in this bill which does not add to the burdens upon the Treasury. And therefore efficiency, according to the theory of this bill, is only to be accomplished by additional expenditure, and of course the efficiency is to be in proportion to the expenditure; and so if efficiency is brought about by giving a captain $2,000 a year, why should you not double his efficiency by giving him $4,000 a year?

There is no pretense that the Army officers do not get enough. As I said the other day, there is no employment under this Government or under any other government in the world that is so much sought for, that is regarded as so desirable, that gives so much for so little return, as service in the Army of the United States. When I say "little return" I mean of the kind we are paying for—military service. Much of it is in the nature of pastime. I do not speak of that for the purpose of reflecting on the men who compose the Army; they can not do what they have not set for them to do. We have not got the service for them to render. They are brave; they are skillful, intrepid, and all that we should require the officers of the Army to be under any emergency whatever; but the fact remains that we have not got the service for them to do, and that we are paying them from two to four times as much as is paid to persons in similar position in the other armies of the world, and our Army renders the least military service of any army in the world. This bill not only adds largely to the emolument of the Army, but it overturns in important particulars that which has been the rule in regard to the Army for a generation. Section 1232 of the Revised Statutes says:

No officer shall use an enlisted man as a servant in any case whatever.

Every officer now is required before he can receive his pay to make a certificate on his honor that he has not during the period for which he claims pay had an enlisted man as a servant. I am not sure but that he is required to do now, as he was during the war, to set out the names of his servants in order to negatively establish the fact that he has not had a soldier in that capacity. I know I was required when I was paid during the war to put down the names of the men that I employed as servants, besides certifying affirmatively that I did not have soldiers as servants. This bill proposes to overturn that, to do away with that rule which has been regarded as wholesome from the beginning of the Army establishment. What is the reason for it, and what will be the consequence of the adoption of this provision found in section 4?

That officers of the Army stationed at military posts apart from settlements may, with the approval of the department commander, each employ one private soldier as a servant: Provided, That the consent of such soldier shall be first procured, and that the sum of $20 per month during the period of such employment shall be charged against the officer employing him.

Remember that the man who is to be used as a servant at a cost $20 a month to the officer whom he serves is a man whom the Government pays a sum, if this bill should pass, ranging from $16 to $18 per month as pay proper. It feeds him, it clothes him, it gives him medical attendance, it transports him, and, as I said, this will cost under any possible condition of things, warranted by what has occurred in the past, at least $800 a year. That, in my judgment, is a moderate estimate. Now, we surrender a man to an officer, so to speak, at $240 a year, a net loss to the Government of $500 per year, in order to give this officer a servant whom he would like to have, and who would cost him far more if he had to hire him from himself.

It is true that this bill says, "that officers of the Army stationed at military posts apart from settlements" may have this privilege; but that is a condition which is absolutely within the discretion of the commanding officer. But now let me venture a prophecy. If this bill is passed 25 per cent. at least of the men who are enlisted under the five-thousand-men clause will be enlisted as servants and put to duty as such under contract with the officers of the Army, and in time by that process, sometimes slow but always sure, which we know is applicable to all matters of this kind, the time will come when every officer in the Army will have a servant under that provision, one costing the Government $800 a year, and for whose service the Government will get but $240 a year. The men who will be enlisted will be cooks for the officers.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator intend to insinuate that every officer of the Army will violate the law intentionally? The bill clearly says that he shall be allowed a servant only where the posts are away from settlements, and that must be approved by the commanding general of the department. He has to determine whether the post is near a settlement or is not. Will the Senator say that every officer of the Army is going to violate the law, and that every commander of a department is going to violate the law? Does he mean to say that?

Mr. PLUMB. I mean to say that wherever you commit a discretion of this kind absolutely and without control to any officer whatever, whether he be military or civil, it is bound to have the widest possible application. It is all well enough to talk about the honor of these men. We do not talk that way when we come to employ men in the Treasury Department as Comptrollers and so on. We limit their functions by law, and we do not trust poor human nature wholly. While we do not presume that men mean to violate the law, we, as far as possible, put it out of their power to do so.

Not only do we give these men servants at this exceeding cost, but we open the door to this enormous enlargement of this class of service; and, as I said, the time will come, and very speedily too, when at least a quarter of all these men, if we should get the whole five thousand under this bill, will be men who are doing service as servants and not as soldiers. Why should the Government enlist men as servants for officers? It would seem as though, if we were to exercise this sort of favor in their behalf, if we do this favor to them, it must be upon the theory that they are badly paid, existing under most unfortunate circumstances, objects of sympathy; and yet, they really have the best berths there are under the Government; but here is a proposition to add six or seven hundred thousand dollars a year to the expense of the Army in order to give them servants, and in order to do that we are to overturn a rule which has existed by operation of law for nearly a generation.

If we had a war, if we were confronted with a great emergency, and it became necessary to set aside the traditions and practices of the past, then we could properly perhaps increase the pay and the privilege and so on; but now at this particular time of all the other times, to not only overturn all the old practices of the Army, the things that have been sanctioned by law and by usage for a generation, but in addition to that to do this at this enormous expense is in my judgment totally unjustifiable.

I have criticised that provision of this bill found in section 13, to the effect that the Secretary of War shall be authorized to cause the enlistment of competent instructors for post schools, and I said that I thought that the enlisted men and the officers of the Army ought themselves act as instructors. Why, Mr. President, the duties of an officer at any post in the United States are not onerous; they are not such as to absorb his entire time. He could find instruction himself in instructing the men of his command at night schools, and at day schools even for that matter, but especially at night schools. But the Senator from Illinois says these are not schools for the private soldiers; they are schools for the families of the officers, and so for the first time in the history of the Army we are to set up an establishment of schools for the benefit of the Army officers.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the Senator does not wish to persistently misrepresent what I have said. I did not state what he alleges. He can not find it in any remarks I made.

Mr. PLUMB. Then it must be because the Senator struck it out before the speech was printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I said no such thing, that it was for the children of officers. I said that many of the officers at the posts had families, that many of the soldiers at the posts had families, and it was not for the soldiers but for the children. I did not even intimate that it was a school for officers, and the Senator ought to know that.

Mr. PLUMB. There was no force to the Senator's statement that the Army officers had children and that the private soldiers had children, unless these instructors were for the purpose of teaching those children.

Mr. LOGAN. For that, as well as other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. I find in section 1231 of the Revised Statutes the provision under which the Army has managed to worry through so far, and under which I think it can get along for a while yet, without danger of sudden death, at all events. It is to this effect:

SEC. 1231. Schools shall be established at all posts, garrisons, and permanent camps at which troops are stationed, in which the enlisted men may be instructed in the common English branches of education, and especially in the history of the United States; and the Secretary of War may detail such officers and enlisted men as may be necessary to carry out this provision. It shall be the duty of the post or garrison commander to set apart a suitable room or building for school and religious purposes.

That has been the law since the 28th day of July, 1866. Now it is proposed to authorize the President to employ instructors for post schools, without any limit to the number—enlist them as part of the military establishment. By the time we have got all these people gathered under the old flag, that assemblage of people which met at the foot of the Tower of Babel would have been but a harmonious unit by comparison with what will be seen if this bill passes—school-teachers, cooks, waiters, laundresses—an army of non-combatants as the accompaniment of a handful of soldiers. Why not enlist everybody else whom an Army officer wants, and put them all into the Army? We enlist servants and teachers for him. Why not enlist instructors in Latin or Greek, and tailors for him to make his clothes, and nurses for his children?

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to read what I did say and not what I did not say, because I certainly did not strike it out?

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will read what he did say, I have no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I will read what I did say:

The Senator—

Referring to the Senator from Kansas—

says the officers should do that; that is, the officers must become school-teachers; they must not perform the duty that is assigned them by law, but they must become school-teachers. His idea of a school in the Army would cut off everybody except soldiers. Does he not know that many of the officers in the Army at the posts have families including children? Does he not know that the majority of them are poor and can not send their children back to the States and pay the expense of their schooling? Does he want those children to go without education? Is that his idea? Does he not know that a great many of the private soldiers and sergeants and corporals in the Army are married men, and have their families at the posts? Does he not know that there is not a post in the United States where you will not find quite a number of small children belonging to officers and soldiers, and yet the soldier has no money with which to send his child to school?

That is what I said, and exactly what I said.

Mr. PLUMB. On that I renew the assertion which I made, that according to the theory of the Senator from Illinois this is to be a means of instruction for the children of officers, because under the law as it is now post schools are required to be maintained for the purpose of giving instruction to the private soldiers, and here is an added provision which has found yet in the advocacy of anybody only the statement of the Senator from Illinois that it is necessary because the officers had families of children which ought to be educated. He asks, why not educate them? Why does he not ask that about some other public officer who has to educate his own children, if they are to be educated, at private or public schools, at his own expense either as a tax-payer or directly by money paid out of his own pocket to tutors?

Is it to be supposed that that wise provision of nature which induces everybody else to send his children to school and pay for their schooling out of his own pocket is lost when a man goes into the Army, that he is not moved by that same impulse, by that same wise and generous instinct to educate his children that every other man has to educate his? Always, heretofore, the Army officers have been required to educate their own children like everybody else; and yet at this late day the Senator from Illinois, fearful that the blight of illiteracy is to come over the families of the Army officers, rises here to appeal to our generous sympathies in favor of education to save these poor, helpless offspring from going down to the degradation of illiteracy. Why is not this provision of section 1231 as ample now as it has been for twenty years past? Why can not we leave to these men, who are now getting more pay than they ever got before in the history of the Republic, to educate their children out of the ample means which we give them in compensation for their services?

My recollection is that a married man can not be enlisted into the Army now, but I believe a special privilege is given occasionally to a man who is already in the service to marry; but the number of married men about the posts is infinitesimal, and the same sergeants and corporals and privates and officers who teach the post schools under section 1231 of the Revised Statutes can teach the children of soldiers as well. I think one advantage ought to come out of the proper enforcement of section 1231, and that is to bridge over the gulf, already too wide, existing between the enlisted men and the officers. They ought to be drawn into closer relations. I do not believe that the ample experience of the Senator from Illinois during the recent war would justify him in saying that an officer increases the efficiency of his command, his control over his own troops, his general merit as an officer, by withdrawing himself from the men whom he commands and giving them ample warrant to believe that he cares not for them nor for their welfare, and that they must wholly shift for themselves.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to make this remark right here if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I think it would not be a commendable act in the Senate, after voting $77,000,000 for the education of the children of citizens all over the country, to refuse to appoint a few post instructors to educate the children of poor officers and poor soldiers.

Mr. PLUMB. I have really believed myself that we should have unnumbered woes if the Blair bill should become a law. I did not expect, however, that my anticipations would be realized before the bill got through the other House. But here in the wake of a bill devoting $77,000,000 to the education of the children of citizens, not yet a law, comes a proposition to add perhaps $6,000,000 to the current expenses of the Army, and the justification of it is in the passage of the Blair bill!

This bill from the first to the last confers nothing but privilege, does not contain a single section that did not cost money, a large majority of which is equivalent to a donation, and I repeat that its cost by way of addition to the regular current expenses of the Government will not be less than $6,000,000, if carried out.

Mr. LOGAN. You said seven millions a minute ago.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas will pause. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, on which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I should be very glad if we could go on with the Army bill until it is completed. It seems to me that every other bill which has come before the Senate this session has been continued to its completion. If there is objection to that, of course I shall not insist upon it, but I should be very glad if it could be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the consideration of the military bill be proceeded with.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] gave notice yesterday that at the close of the morning hour, at 2 o'clock to-day, he would ask the Senate to take up a certain resolution or bill, with a view to submitting some remarks upon it, as he was compelled to leave here on account of personal business. I believe it has always been the courtesy of the Senate to accede to such a request.

Mr. LOGAN. I certainly shall not insist. I said I would like to have the Army bill disposed of; but I am not going to persist in shoving anybody else aside. If anybody is to be shoved aside, let it be me. That is usual.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the continued consideration of the military bill?

Mr. PLATT. I object to anything which displaces the bill for the admission of Washington. I am willing to be accommodating about it, but I think I have a right to keep that as the unfinished business of the Senate; and I must object and object seriously to anything which displaces that. If the Senator from North Carolina——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PLATT. I presume the Senator from Oregon would yield to the Senator from North Carolina if the latter desires to address the Senate at this time and can not do so at another time on account of matters of his own personal convenience. I am perfectly willing that the Washington bill may be laid aside informally for that purpose.

Mr. DOLPH. I gave way to the Senator from Connecticut because I did not wish to undertake to control and direct the disposition of the bill under consideration. I, of course, under the circumstances will give way for the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Connecticut as objecting to the postponement of the Washington bill, and the Senator from Oregon, having the floor, gives way to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall, however, desire to resume the floor after the Senator from North Carolina has completed his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will have the right to the floor whenever the Washington bill comes up.

Mr. VANCE. I am obliged to the Senate for its courtesy.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me a word, I will not take up the time of the Senate; but I should like to put a statement in connection with that of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] where he says this increase will cost six or seven millions of dollars. I do not wish to discuss the matter; but in answer to the proposition of the Senator from Kansas that the cost will be $7,000,000——

Mr. PLUMB. I object to that going in now. I want to comment on it. I do not care to have it injected in the middle of my remarks.

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose the Senator will continue his remarks to-morrow morning.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to occupy about ten minutes more. I do not care to have this matter interposed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. I will not object if it is material; but the Senator from Illinois had better put it in as part of his own remarks. I do not care to have it go in as part of mine, and I want to conclude.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator need not put it into his remarks unless he chooses, but I want to read it in answer to what he has said.

Mr. PLUMB. I will read it myself and save the Senator the trouble. I have no particular desire to go on now; at the same time I think in ten minutes I shall close what I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. I ask consent of the Senate to call up Senate bill 839.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to lay aside informally the pending bill with a view to considering the bill (S. 839) to repeal chapter 27 of the acts of 1883 relating to civil service.

Mr. PLATT. What was the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To lay aside informally the pending bill with a view to take up the bill the title of which has been read. If there is no objection that order will be made.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a few minutes to read a paragraph?

Mr. PLUMB. I object. I do not want anything put in upon that matter until I conclude my speech.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not in your speech but in my speech, sir; and you have no right to object.

Mr. VANCE. I yield.

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

Mr. LOGAN. You can not object——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his kindness and generosity.

Mr. PLUMB. Thank you, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. It only shows that the politeness is all on that side.

Mr. VANCE. I will proceed now if it is thought I can do so with safety. [Laughter.]

REPEAL OF CIVIL-SERVICE LAW.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has agreed to take up the bill (S. 839) to repeal chapter 27 of the acts of 1883 relating to civil service.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, at the close of the great civil war, when the party then in power desired to reconstruct a portion of this Government on principles which would secure its domination, it so happened that a constitutional President stood in the way. It was necessary to divest him of his prerogative before that party could accomplish its unconstitutional object, and a regular attack upon his rightful powers was begun by the passage of the tenure-of-office law. But soon after Mr. Johnson's term of office had expired—his successor being one who was in sympathy with the party then in power—the necessity for that law was no longer felt; that is to say, the offices could be secured without it. That law, therefore, was modified. But the remnant of it was left on the statute-book as a reminder of the iniquity, to be brought up again when necessary. That necessity, however, did not arise until after the Presidential election of 1884, when a Democrat was chosen to fill that office. But being wise in their generation and fearing that for want of control of both Houses of Congress it might not be able to resurrect that law, the Republican party fell upon the plan of perpetuating the official existence of its friends by the enactment of a law "to regulate and improve the civil service of the country." It was a continuation of the old assault upon the rights of the Executive; and all of the present troubles between the Executive and the Senate are due and chargeable to that enactment. And I propose to address myself to that law, a bill for the repeal of which I heretofore had the honor of introducing. But before addressing myself to either the unconstitutionality or the impolicy of that enactment, I wish to say that one of my chief objections to it and to all other laws which restrict or intrench upon the established rights and prerogatives of any department of the Government is the tendency to defeat the will of the people as expressed at popular elections, and to that extent to impair and destroy the vigor and efficiency of political parties in this country.

Mr. President, in the broadest and most comprehensive sense of the term I avow myself a party man; not from natural pugnacity of temper, not because of prejudice against those who may differ with me, nor yet because I believe there are no evils inseparably connected with party organization, but because I do believe most earnestly that parties are indispensable to the existence of liberty, and that a government by party is the only way in which there can be government by the people.

Party—

Says Edmund Burke—

is a body of men united for promoting by their joint endeavors the national interest upon some particular principle in which they are all agreed. Men thinking freely will in particular instances think differently. But still as the greater part of the measures which arise in the course of public business are related to, or dependent on, some great leading, general principles in government, a man must be peculiarly unfortunate in the choice of his political company if he does not agree with them at least nine times in ten. And this is all that ever was required for a character of the greatest uniformity and steadiness in connection. How men can proceed without connection at all is to me incomprehensible.

Lord John Russell, in his essay on the English Government and constitution, says:

Now, of the two ways of procuring adherents—the attachment of interest and that of party—party is by far the best. Many a man I fear would abandon his opinions and fall off from his principles for the sake of office who will yet not desert a party to which he is engaged by passion and affection as well as by reason. * * * The good effects of party in this country are numerous and weighty. One of the chief of them is that it gives a substance to the shadowy opinions of politicians, and attaches them permanently to steady and lasting principles. The true party man finds in his own mind certain general rules of politics like the general rules of morals by which he decides every new and doubtful case. The belief that those principles are just enables him to withstand the seductions of interest and the ingenuity of projects; his conduct acquires somewhat of the firmness of integrity and wisdom. * * * In reckoning up the bad effects of party, I have not spoken of the animosities and violent contentions it produces. Mock philosophers, sentimental women, and effeminate men are always making lamentations over political divisions and contested elections. Men of noble minds know that they are the workshop of national liberty and national prosperity. It is from the heat and hammering of the stithy that freedom receives its form, its temper, and its strength.

Says Mr. Madison:

No free country has ever been without parties, which are a natural offspring of freedom.

Says Francis Lieber in his Political Ethics:

I believe that there never existed a free country actively developing within its bosom constitutional law and feeling deeply interested in the great problems of right and public justice in which there were not also parties. For neither in the physical world nor in the moral or intellectual is anything great to be obtained without struggle, and when there is struggle there must be two sides—two parties. * * * Indeed we must answer at once the second question, that it is impossible for civil liberty to exist without parties.

To the same purport are Hallam, Macaulay, and other publicists beyond the sea, as well as most of our own.

I need not dwell upon this proposition. Every well-informed man in America is aware of the vast influence which has been exerted by party organizations in giving effect to the popular will, in promoting the prosperity of the United States, and guarding the rights and liberties of their citizens. Though here, as in England, we have our mock philosophers, our sentimental women, and our effeminate men who constantly preach against the dangers of party spirit—very often when preparing to sell themselves out to the opposite side—yet men of noble minds know that the much-lauded checks and balances of the Constitution itself are not now and never have been half so efficient for the preservation of rights and for the restraint of corruption as the fierce and waiting hostility of a well-organized opposition to the party in power. Let the two great parties into which the American people are now divided be once obliterated, and no others with clear-cut issues arise to take their places; let the one-time English idea of attaching adherents to the administration and obtaining support for its policy by interest and office instead of party become prevalent in this country, and in less than a quarter of a century there would be scarcely a vestige of the rights of the people or the States remaining.

Moreover—

Said Horace Walpole—

I have a maxim—that the extinction of party is the origin of faction.

And Horace Walpole ought to have known. In my honest opinion no more unmistakable sign of the decay of public virtue in politics has been furnished by American history than the rise, if indeed it can be said to have arisen, of that maudlin political sentiment which we recognize, for want of a better, under the name of "Mugwumpism," a kind of sickly, sentimental, Sunday-school, "Goody Two-shoes" party, which appears desirous of ruling the world not as God has made it, but as they would have it. Under the fair guise of liberty, moderation, and public integrity, its tendency, if not its purpose, is to destroy the manhood, the outspoken courage of bluff Anglo-Saxon statesmanship, and seeks to substitute therefor a hybrid system of Pecksniffian snivel, which is to be in our politics what cant is to true religion, what pharisaism is to the divine virtue of humility, and which will ultimately prove, like all other hybrids, simply an unhappy mixture of the more ignoble qualities of each parent. Men who fall in love with this diluted form of political ethics forget that with all the evils attending extreme partisanship we have also the candor, the courage, the outspoken sentiment, the manly defiance of opposition, the eager and zealous defense of principle which has infused, with all its roughness, a spirit of chivalry into our political warfare. We know each other. We know where we may expect to find ourselves and our opponents. We can calculate of each other that, whatever of evil there may be, there will be no deception, no hypocrisy, no pretense.

Sir, there is nothing in the nature of man that stamps his nobility more unmistakably than this spirit of generous rivalry in ardent strife for worthy purposes. The untutored schoolboy instinctively shouts his admiration at every exhibition of pluck and magnanimity in a square stand-up fight. Men who differ honestly and maintain that difference boldly present everywhere the very best side of our nature. No instances in history so captivate the mind of every reader as those which exemplify this spirit of fair play and generosity. There is nothing in the romances of Richard or Saladin, there is nothing in the charge of the six hundred "into jaws of death and hell" which more thrills the soul of the student than that story which is told of the battle of Fontenoy, where, when the lines of battle were formed in close gunshot range, the English officers came to the front and invited the French to fire first; to which the French officers replied, after they had stepped forward, removed their hats, and bowed profoundly, "Not so, messieurs; the gentlemen of the French Guard never give but receive the first fire." And they did receive it! It was but yesterday that the heart of every generous man in America was warmed by the simple story of how some ex-Union soldiers in New York had dedicated the pensions paid to them by a grateful Government for fighting to preserve the Union to the support of some poor, disabled confederate soldiers who had fought against the Union. No handsomer tribute has been paid to these elevated principles of human nature which are generated by honorable strife than was uttered by an eloquent Republican Senator lately in this Chamber [Mr. SPOONER] when eulogizing our dead Vice-President as an honorable, a magnanimous, and unflinching party man.

For want of political parties Russia has nihilism and despotism. For want of parties based upon well-known constitutional principles France is divided into personal factions and cliques, and dwells above the red-hot fires of communism. For want of like constitutional parties Germany, the earliest home of the liberties of our race, is honey-combed by the destructive tenets of socialism, which is only restrained by the conversion of what should be a free limited monarchy into an almost absolute despotism, supported by an army so vast and expensive as to very nearly eat up the substance and destroy the productive capacity of her people. Austria has scarcely a semblance of what may be termed political parties, and has no more liberty than party.

The history of the world is replete with the lessons which confirm the truth of Mr. Madison's words, that parties are indeed "the natural offspring of liberty." Freedom, truly, is the priceless gem which is crystallized in the fierce heats of party strife. That strife must continue forever, if it be that freedom is to live forever. There is no rest for the free.

The passage of the civil-service law, as I have intimated, was an attack upon the rightful prerogative of the Executive and a blow aimed at the integrity of political parties. It will be felt in all that parties are intended to preserve—the institutions of our country. The cornerstone of those institutions are:

First. The eligibility of all qualified freemen to hold office, and therefore the right to seek office at the source of power.

Second. A brief term of office.

Third. A direct and immediate responsibility of all elective officers to the people.

Fourth. A mediate and indirect responsibility of all appointed officers to the people through the direct and immediate responsibility of the appointing power.

All these essential features of our constitution of government are contravened by this law known as the civil-service act.

Every citizen of the United States is qualified by law to hold any office unless the disqualification appear in the Constitution itself. The only disqualifications found in that instrument are those contained in the fourteenth amendment thereto, for participation in rebellion; the requirement that the President of the United States shall be a native and thirty-five years old; that Senators shall have been nine years residents of the States for which they may be chosen and thirty years old, and that Representatives shall be twenty-five years old and seven years inhabitants of the States from which they may be chosen. With these exceptions every citizen of the United States is qualified by the Constitution and laws thereof to hold any office under the Government, and, therefore, entitled to seek any office, elective or appointive.

"As long as office is open to all men and no constitutional rank is established, it is true republicanism," said Alexander Hamilton. "The limitations of power, the frequency of elections by the body of the people, the capacity of every individual citizen to be elected to any office to which his talents and integrity may commend him, and the responsibility of every public agent to his constituents, the people, for his conduct are the distinguishing features of a representative democracy." (Tucker's Blackstone.)

Again, I repeat, these inestimable rights and franchises can be taken from no citizen by act of Congress. The Constitution itself provides the only way by which it may be done, to wit, by conviction of certain crimes. When it was determined to make ineligibility to office a penalty for participation in the late war against the Union without trial and conviction it was not even attempted by law; it was done by amendment to the Constitution, thereby admitting that Congress can not deprive any citizen of his right to seek and to hold office.

This perfect equality of right is one of the proudest and most distinguishing features of democratic government. By the civil-service law and the regulations established under its provisions by sublegislation no citizens but those who are of a certain age and who reside in certain States and who submit to and satisfactorily pass a certain examination are eligible to appointment. Nay, it is worse than that; for only four out of all those who possess the prescribed qualifications and who have successfully undergone the required test are permitted to seek an appointment.

Look at it in this way: Given a vacant place to be filled in the executive department by the requirements of the Constitution, there are one million American citizens competent to fill it. Each has a right to apply for it equal in law to the right of any other man. Each has the right to go directly, without hinderance, to the appointing power. But the civil-service law says, not so; no one shall be appointed, no one's application shall be considered even, except those of the favored four who may run the gauntlet; while the 999,996 are disfranchised and forever barred! It is no answer to say that this is no disfranchisement, for that all men may apply to the board of commissioners. That board does not appoint; it simply says who shall and who shall not be appointed. It is no answer to say that it is no disfranchisement because only one man out of the million can get the vacant office; for the million have the right to seek for it and take their chances.

There are two methods of obtaining office in our country, and two only: one is by election of the people, and the other by appointment by those on whom the people have conferred the appointing power. Now, if under the Constitution you can by this law forbid citizens from seeking office of the appointing power, you can also forbid them in the same way from seeking office of the people. Who is prepared to say that the people shall only choose from a certain number who shall have been culled by an examining board? Who is prepared to restrict their choice?

It would be much better for all concerned if, instead of disfranchising men in this indirect way, there should be a positive law, fixed in definite terms, excluding them. Instead of that, however, a tribunal is established, by whom men are to be deprived of birthrights at its own sweet arbitrary discretion.

In all the descents from the elevations of freedom to the low levels of despotism there is no more easy nor better-worn stepping-stone than this of making rights dependent on human discretion. Said the great English lawyer Lord Camden:

> The discretion of a judge is the law of tyrants; it is always unknown; it is different in different men; it is casual, and depends upon constitution, temper, passion. In the best it is oftentimes caprice; in the worst it is every vice, folly, and passion to which human nature is liable.

If these words of the eminent lawyer be true of those comparatively simple matters of law which, for convenience, are usually intrusted to the discretion of a judge, what must be thought of a law which makes one of the dearest and grandest rights of an American citizen, the right to hold office and participate in the government of his country, dependent on the mere discretion of three men who are not responsible to the people nor to anybody else, and who are utterly unknown to the Constitution of the country? What a definition and limitation of human rights that is, dependent as they are made to be by the civil-service law upon the accidents of personal appearance of candidates, of an unpleasing speech on the part of one, or upon the state of the commissioner's liver, or perhaps his personal prejudice, a bad night's rest, failure of his morning bitters, or it may his appetite for dinner! Is not this the very essence of absurdity and of despotism?

By the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution it is provided that—

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Of course, then, Congress has no right to make such a law which it has forbidden the States to make, unless such power be clearly found in the Constitution. But there is no such power there; nor is there anything there from which that power might be derived by necessary implication. By no process of logic can it be shown that the prohibition of the exercise of a power residing in a State by implication confers that power upon Congress. Nothing but express words or necessary implication can confer any power whatever upon the General Government. Here there are neither express words nor necessary implication from express words authorizing any such power. In truth, the express objects of the Constitution in all its grants of power are intended mainly to preserve and enlarge rather than to destroy or abridge the rights of citizens. Having no right then by law to abridge the rights of citizens of the United States, it necessarily follows that Congress can pass no law which permits any one else to do so. It can not, of course, delegate a power which it does not possess.

I maintain that the civil-service law and the regulations prescribed thereunder manifestly do abridge the rights of citizens of the United States to apply for and receive office. In the lexicons the word "abridge" is defined to mean "to contract; to diminish." Now let us see if any man's rights have been contracted or diminished by this law and the regulations made under its authority.

On the morning, we will say, of the 15th of January, 1883, any citizen of the United States not included within the disqualifications of the Constitution already mentioned had the undisputed right to apply to and receive from the President, one of the heads of the Executive Departments, the courts of law—wherever the appointing power was lodged—any office which it was in their power under the Constitution to give; and this without reference to the age, the scholarship, the State residence, or to the bibulous propensities or personal habits of the citizen. These and all other requisites touching his fitness were left in the sole discretion of the power which appoints him. And this uncontrolled power to judge and to choose constituted an important part of his rights in the premises; "and wherever the power is lodged, there it must remain," says Mr. Cooley on constitutional limitations. On the morning of the 17th day of January, 1883, the citizen awoke and found—

First. That neither the President, the courts of law, nor the heads of Departments could appoint him to any place within the classified departmental service, the classified customs service, or the classified postal service unless he were recommended by three men whose functions were first established by a law approved on the day before.

Second. That had he been over thirty-five years old, not all the appointing power mentioned in the Constitution, aided by that mentioned in the recently approved law, could have appointed him to any place within the classified postal service, or to any place in the classified customs service or classified departmental service had he been under twenty-one or over forty-five years old.

Third. That no one or all of them combined could have appointed him to any place within the classified service had he been a citizen of a State which had more than a certain proportion of appointments with reference to population.

Fourth. That he could not have been appointed legally to any office in the classified service if two members of his family were already in the public service.

Fifth. That had he been examined and found qualified, he could not then have presented himself and been appointed even though the appointing power had desired it; but would have been compelled to wait until the board of commissioners had seen proper to present his name, and if it did not see fit to do so within a certain time his name would have been dropped from the list of "eligible," never to be presented. And, lastly, that he could not anywhere approach the appointing power to ask for position.

Now, if it be that these advantages and opportunities to participate in the government of his country are not "rights" of the citizen protected by the Constitution, what are they? If they be rights within the meaning of that instrument, is it not absurd to insist that they are not "abridged," contracted, diminished by this civil-service law? Can any man doubt that the right to seek and to hold office is an essential right of a freeman of the very highest political character? Says Lord John Russell in the same treatise to which I have already referred:

> Under the head of personal liberty should be placed eligibility to office, civil and military. The policy of the great states of the world has been often narrow, illiberal, and unjust upon this branch of true freedom.

The great and patriotic Lord Somers on a momentuous occasion also gave it as his opinion that there "could scarcely be a more unhappy condition for an Englishman than to be rendered incapable of serving his country in any civil or military office."

Again, this law by restraining the executive power of removal and appointment tends to the establishment of a privileged class of office-holders with a tenure for life. It favors the setting apart and consecrating of a portion of our citizens to the honors and emoluments of office to the exclusion of the others, in imitation of the aristocratical institutions of Great Britain and of the Continent, and still further back, in imitation of the family of Levi, which, among the Jews, was exclusively devoted to the priesthood, leaving all the burdens of state, either in peace or war, to be borne by the other tribes.

Another serious objection to the law is that it creates unusual offenses and attaches unusual penalties for their commission. It also takes away the President's power and duty to execute the laws and confers them unconstitutionally upon the board of commissioners. They are given supervision and control over everbody, including the President, in all matters pertaining to the enforcement of this law. It is the duty of this board of commissioners to see that all persons subject to this law abstain absolutely from all political service, and especially that they do not lie upon each other; that no Senator, Representative, or other officer of the Government shall recommend anybody for office or violate the provisions of this act in any way, but that all shall dwell together in millennial peace and harmony, and forever remain virtuous and happy. Why it omitted to enact the whole civil service of the country into a national Sunday-school—a grand consolidated American Ebenezer—with these commissioners as teachers and exhorters, subject to the visitation of Mugwump presbyters, is something that the truly good and pious political saints must ever regret. If any malicious, evil-disposed persons whomsoever, not having the fear of God before their eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, should in any way hinder, deceive, or impede an applicant for initiation into the privileged tribe of Levi, or tell a lie upon him in regard to his character or qualifications, or even give any special or secret information about him, though never so true, they shall yet be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000, or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or by both fine and imprisonment.

So much for even attempting to help a good man get in office or furnishing information to keep a bad one out! So much for attempting to even handle these official eggs while under the motherly incubation of these national hens, the Civil Service Commissioners! As for all other American citizens who would like to have office in the usual way under a Democratic administration because it is their right and because they helped to create that administration, you may lie upon, hinder, and deceive, and furnish against them all sorts of information, special and general, the more the better, and their only remedy is an action for slander, a hickory stick, or a shot-gun. How much these legal terrors may assist the Government in procuring correct information in regard to the aspirants for place is a question not solvable in any ordinary preparation of logic. How it may look in the eyes of civilized nations, especially the "effete dynasties" of Europe, to have near the close of the nineteenth century established in this great Republic a board of censors of public morals, to watch the President of the United States and make him walk a chalk-line, to keep a sharp lookout on Senators and Representatives and see to it that they are up to no mischief, and to supervise the Supreme Court, and to take care that its frolicsome youngsters shall commit no crime, this deponent saith not. But of such is the kingdom of civil-service reform!

The one grand idea which actuated the earliest settlers of the American wilderness was the desire to escape from irresponsible hereditary power, from class rulers, from a government which could not be changed if bad and oppressive without revolutionary violence. By tracing the history of the principal streams of emigration which constituted our colonial blood it will be observed that each one was seeking to escape from political or ecclesiastical oppression in one form or another for which there was no redress by peaceful or constitutional means. Their exodus in each case sprang from a strong desire "to make an offering to liberty in the wilderness which the stringency of power prevented them making at home." When the final rupture between them and the mother country was accomplished their chief desire was to lay the foundations of a new government in such principles as would forever relieve them and their descendants from the fear of a recurrence of such oppressions. Their action in this regard was characterized by an insurmountable opposition to hereditary political power in any shape and under any circumstances. It is, perhaps, not too much to say that the chief means upon which they relied for the preservation of their liberties and to prevent the recurrence of the evils from which they had fled was the constitution of the offices of all their rulers upon brief tenures, to be frequently changed and to be directly responsible to the source of power.

"A suspicious watchfulness of all official authority," says Mr. Van Buren, "proportioned to their knowledge of its liability to be abused; a consequent indisposition to concede more than was indispensable to good government; the establishment of a certain, and, as they called it, a 'swift responsibility' for the exercise of that which was granted; a habitual distrust of every offer of special privileges by Government, and an unwillingness to confer the power to grant them." They first settled an absolute division of the functions of government—legislative, executive, and judicial—and declared that they should forever remain separate, distinct, and independent. They fixed the very briefest possible terms for the tenure of all offices, and declared for the frequency of elections. They rejected with heated scorn, amounting almost to fierceness, the proposition of such men as Alexander Hamilton, John Adams, Gouverneur Morris, and others, great as were their abilities and eminent as had been their services. This proposition briefly outlined was that the President should hold his office during life and good behavior, and should have an absolute negative upon all bills, resolutions, and acts of Congress; that Senators should hold office by the same tenure, and have the exclusive power of declaring war; that the General Government should appoint the governors of all the States, who should hold their offices by a like tenure, and who should have power to negative all State laws, subject to the regulation and control of Congress; and that Congress should have power to pass any law it might deem necessary to the common defense and general warfare of the Union. This, of course, carried with it by implication a life tenure in all the minor offices of the Government. But notwithstanding its great backing, that proposition never came to a vote in the convention which framed our Constitution. When that instrument was adopted by which the briefest tenures of all offices were prescribed the implication was irresistible that the minor offices established by law were to have the same brevity of existence. A hundred reasons for this implication could be given. So obvious were they, however, that at the very earliest date the precedent was established, and to this day it has been followed without question or interruption.

This civil-service law is the second attempt to recur to the Hamiltonian principle, and is most cunningly begun at the bottom, where it would attract the least attention and indignation. Well did the late President Garfield say the doctrine of Alexander Hamilton is waxing and that of Thomas Jefferson is waning. Had he happily lived until to-day and seen the operation of this law and been a witness to the position which the Senate of the United States is now occupying, he would have been astonished at the rapid verification of his utterance.

If the Chief Magistrate can hold his office for four years only, why should a clerk hold his for life? If the President after four years of diligent and patriotic service must submit himself and his deeds again to the judgment of his fellow-citizens, why should his subordinates be granted exemption from like submission and be endowed with official immortality? It works well, they say; the longer the clerk serves the more competent he is to serve well. Is not the same true of a President? Is not the same true of a Senator, a Representative, and all other officers? If the system work well with the minor officer, will it not work equally well with the major? And if that be true, will we not soon begin to extend it? Indeed it was annouuced in the discussion of the bill that it was tentative, and it was intended to be extended, as experience justified, to the whole civil service of the Government. In fact, has not the President of the United States pledged himself, with certain reservations, in obedience to a supposed public opinion, to extend the spirit of the law beyond its legal effect to all the higher appointments which pertain to him? If that be so, is not that the waxing of the principles of Alexander Hamilton and the waning of those of Thomas Jefferson?

There are, indeed, among us very many strong, influential men who heartily detest the excitements and the turmoil of freedom by which they are brought into contact with their legal, but not their social, equals as they fancy. Once in office, they prefer to stay there without the trouble and disturbance of a re-election. It is naturally and selfishly so in all ranks and classes. The national banks want the privilege of supplying the currency, and do not want to be disturbed by any legislation except such as they apply for. The manufacturers, entrenched behind protective duties against the competition of all the world, deplore any "tinkering with the tariff." With the wail of the martyr who first feels the fire the railroad monopolists pray to be protected against legislative mobs and to be permitted to enjoy whatever they may get in peace. The bondholders too join in the plaintive song of protest with all the privileged classes of society. And so soon as a clerk finds himself ensconced in a snug position he also raises the same tune, which is indeed a common meter, and prays to be delivered from the dangers of a change in administration. They all fear the restless insistence and persistence of that terrible mob called the people; that fierce democracy who, in season and out of season, will demand that control over their rulers which they know to be indispensable to the preservation of their rights. But fear not, ye of little faith; no amount of laws to restrain their power, no amount of argument to show them their incapacity for self-government will ever induce them to relax their hold upon the throttle of the engine.

Where is to be the stopping point to this waxing of the Hamiltonian theory?

Presidential elections are often complained of in these latter days; they are said to engender much and very dangerous excitement; to be revolutionary in a moderate way; and particularly to disturb the stock market; and propositions are loudly made to diminish their frequency and to enlarge the Presidential term. This is in the direct line of civil-service reform, which consists in getting as far as possible away from the control of the people. It would indeed be a great convenience to the occupants of that exalted position if elections were not so frequent. It would indeed be acceptable to that entire class of our fellow-citizens who wish to enjoy in a dignified and easy manner all the benefits of order and good government without the trouble of going through the ceremonies and the labors required to furnish it.

To come to my third proposition. Undoubtedly, as before explained, one of the most important elements considered in the arrangement of our scheme of government was the fixing of responsibility for the manner in which the powers granted were to be exercised. In this, to use a lawyer's phrase, they were astute to find the methods. The most obvious of these for all elective officers was short terms and frequent elections. By this each officer's faithfulness and capacity were to be periodically passed upon by his masters, the people, and they were to determine whether or not he merited another lease of power.

The theory of our system—

Well said the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]— is that where a man is elected or appointed he shall abandon his functions at the end of a certain term to receive the verdict of the people or the appointing power as to whether he has discharged his duties well and is fit for the place again, * * * to the end that men may not become so intrenched in prerogative and formidably surrounded by privilege that they can at their will disregard their duties.

The Chief Executive, as the grand source of the appointing power for officers not elective, was given a term of four years only in order that he, as the great exemplar of all, should receive the judgment of the people upon the manner in which he had discharged his important trust. Lastly, the pains and penalties of impeachment were added to the responsibilities of the Chief Executive and all the high officials, and a court was provided to carry this great remedy of freemen against evil rulers into effect. But our fathers were as generous as they were wise, and they conferred upon all their servants the powers necessary to the discharge of their appointed functions commensurate with their great responsibilities. To the President they were especially liberal in the granting of power necessary to the execution of his important office. After limiting his term to four years and providing for his impeachment, they prescribed as his chief duty that he should "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and granted to him the "executive powers of the Government." It follows, then, logically, that being vested with all executive power by these words first used, he is entitled and compelled to exercise every function of the Government which is executive in its character, except only wherein it has been limited by the same instrument. It can not be limited by law, even though that implies the consent of the President. In other words, he can not legally surrender any executive power, and any attempt to do so by approving an unconstitutional law is a nullity. It would, among other reasons, throw off the responsibilities with which the Constitution has invested him as one of the safeguards of official conduct.

In the great debate in the First Congress upon the question, which has been recently revived for discussion, of the right of the Senate to participate in removals from as well as appointments to office, Mr. Madison said:

It is said that it comports with the nature of things that those who appoint shall have the power of removal, but I can not conceive that this sentiment is warranted by the Constitution. I believe it would be found inconvenient in practice. It is one of the most prominent features of the Constitution, a principle that pervades the whole system, that there should be the highest possible degree of responsibility in all the executive officers thereof. Anything, therefore, which tends to lessen this responsibility is contrary to its spirit and intention.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that no well-informed man can doubt that the whole scheme of the Constitution providing for a direct responsibility to and dependence on the people as the source of power, and whose happiness and well-being are the sole objects of the Government, is the very essence of liberty and stability. This law to which I am objecting tends directly to the abrogation of this principle. It diminishes the power of the Executive to appoint, it restrains if it does not destroy the power to remove all officials embraced in its terms. It diminishes the power of the administration to employ efficient agents of the executive department, and it diminishes the responsibilities of the Executive. It is, therefore, according to Mr. Madison, "contrary to the spirit and intention" of the Constitution.

Who is responsible for the conduct of an executive officer appointed under this law? Not the President, certainly; for his appointee is selected by the board of commissioners. Not the head of any Department, surely; for the commission chooses the appointee for him. Not the courts of law, of course; for Congress has delegated no power to appoint to the courts of law. Who, then, is responsible? The commission? It will deny it, and say that it only recommended such as appeared fit for the positions. But granting that the commission is responsible, how is it to be held to that responsibility? It is far removed from the people—the more is the pity. Can the President remove the members of that commission? Even that is doubtful, upon the construction given by the Republican side of this Chamber. In the debate on the passage of the act various opinions were expressed, the majority appearing to believe that the President could not remove them without the advice and consent of the Senate.

In my opinion the President has the power and the right, which it is his duty to exercise, to remove at discretion all executive officers of the Government. I believe that this power is unrestricted by the Constitution, and is therefore unrestrictable by law. The power of appointment is given to the President by express words, but is limited as to certain grades of officers by the grant of power to the Senate to confirm. The power to remove does not merely follow by necessary implication from the power to appoint, but is expressly granted in the words used: "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States." "The executive power" includes all executive power, and is absolute unless it be restricted elsewhere; and all we have to do is to determine whether removal from office be an act of an executive nature, and, if so, whether there be any limitation of it elsewhere in the Constitution. There will be found none in express terms, and rightly none by implication. In case of appointment the Senate has power to confirm or reject. It can not be implied that it therefore has power to disapprove or confirm a removal, for that grant was an exception to the general power given, and must be taken strictly.

This subject received Congressional construction by the great debate and action during the First Congress in 1789. Speaking of the decision then rendered, which was acquiesced in without break until Republican greed for office sought to hamper the hands of President Johnson in 1867 by the unconstitutional tenure-of-office law, Chancellor Kent says:

> This amounted to a legislative construction of the Constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon as of decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every officer of Government appointed by the President and Senate whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by the weighty reason that the subordinate officers in the executive department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of that department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and every participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle and ought to be taken strictly. The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law, and the power of removal was incidental to that duty and might often be requisite to fulfill it. (1 Kent's Commentaries, page 310.)

To the same purport was Mr. Calhoun's speech in the Senate in 1834 upon the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank. Said he:

> But while I thus severely condemn the conduct of the President in removing the former Secretary and appointing the present one, I must say that in my opinion it is a case of abuse and not of the usurpation of power. The President has the right of removal from office.

Not the President and Senate, but the President. Mr. Madison and Mr. Webster held the same views. Indeed, with more or less of difference in the reasons assigned, nearly all the great statesmen of the country for seventy-five years have been content to leave the power of removal of all executive officers in the hands of the President alone as the responsible head who was charged with the faithful execution of the laws. There is where it ought to be now; there it is not left by the civil-service law. Congress in passing that law, therefore, violated the Constitution by impairing the executive power over its subordinates quite as flagrantly as it did in the passage of the tenure-of-office act; and by voluntarily submitting to its provisions the President, in my judgment, surrenders a prerogative which it is his duty to defend.

As I have expressed my disapprobation of the tenure-of-office law and all partisan attempts to infringe the rights of the Executive and thwart the will of the people, so do I condemn this civil-service law as the meanest and most insidious of them all. Professing to avoid any direct interference with his power, it yet surrounds the President with checks and hinderances on every hand. It binds him with his own consent. Instead of the free discretion to choose his agents from the whole body of American citizens, it binds him to choose from the four selected for him by others. Instead of choosing an officer pleasing to him, he is compelled to take one who is pleasing to the Civil Service Commissioners. When a new President is elected, instead of being able to freely choose his own agents to assist him in the execution of the laws, he is bound to leave those of his predecessor in full possession. Instead of that high discretion with which the Constitution invests him, this civil-service law substitutes the discretion of an irresponsible commission, and confers these high powers on three men, who are to incubate on certain inchoate official eggs and hatch executive officers, warranted to be of better quality and capacity than those propagated by the natural methods. No wonder that more than one of its eminent advocates said that its execution naturally presupposed a President friendly to its provisions. It could not live a moment except by the voluntary submission of the Executive to its absurd and fantastic arrangements. Did its originators get the idea from Professor Baird's fish hatchery, or did they go to England for it?

We were often told in the debate upon the bill of the excellence of the British system of civil service, which, it was said, was not changed with every administration. Of course not. The executive power of Great Britain is hereditary and changes only at the death of the monarch. The administration, however, changes at will, and may change every week. Therefore, the idea of life tenure for executive officers is consistent with an executive for life. Therefore, an official class of life-long tenure is consistent with monarchical and aristocratical government, which is peculiarly a government of classes. But it is not consistent with a democratic government and a short-lived executive, where no class is recognized by law and all men are equal.

When the people of England, through their representatives in the house of commons, desire a change in the administration of the government they simply vote a want of confidence in that government. The executive officers in power are not changed otherwise than so far as the change of policy may require. That is all that is expected or desired. Besides, as the executive there was hereditary, there was no way of avoiding corrupt or inefficient minor officers except by competitive examinations. There was no responsibility to the people for bad appointments. Here there is such responsibility; here all is different. When the people elect a President, avowing a different policy from that of his predecessor, they thereby declare not only for a change of policy but for a change in the personnel of the Government as well. This has been the universal custom to the present day. The people expect the man of their choice whom they have elected to remove those in office and appoint every man whom he may deem necessary to the effectual carrying out, not of his, but of their will. And especially was this true of the last Presidential election, which was influenced more by the desire for a thoroughly radical change in the personnel of the late administration than for any other consideration whatever. The proof of this was the universal cry, the party slogan, "Turn the rascals out."

It was said, and justly said, that so long a continuance in power of one set of officials was hurtful to liberty and public integrity; that wrongs and corruptions would naturally creep into official life and remain unexposed if new men did not frequently come in to investigate and denounce them. The people willed this in 1884. Their will has not been respected. Their President's hands were bound by this civil-service law which he had promised to maintain, and they were further bound by his own extra-legal promises to carry the spirit of that law into his whole administration. They are still bound by the presence of innumerable political enemies who surround him on every hand. And even in the few cases where he has attempted to surround himself with men in sympathy with him and with those who elected him, a hostile Senate stands ready to thwart him by the use not only of its confirming power but by the usurpation of a power which does not belong to it, for the purpose of keeping the friends of the majority in office at any cost.

Such treatment, in my opinion, relieves the President from any obligation to keep his promises in that respect. They were made, I will not permit myself to doubt, in the utmost good faith, actuated by a patriotic desire for public efficiency and integrity. No doubt they were made, too, in a spirit of concession to those eminent Republicans who had grudgingly admitted the corruptions which had grown up in their own party as a result of their long lease of power. A sample of these admissions I will here give in the shape of an extract from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in the debate on the bill. He said that abuses had gotten to such a point "as to attract the attention of the country and to demand reform." And that Senator went on to say that the Democrats were called on to make this sacrifice "to emphasize their patriotism and their fitness for the administration of the country by denying and disdaining the use of a weapon of which they have so often felt the edge and the weight for many years." Stripped of the fine verbiage in which the Senator disguised it and translated into the home vernacular, that sentence would read about as follows: "We have been in office so long that our corruptions have become offensive to all honest men. There is about to come a day of doom for us, and there is no doubt the people will elect a Democratic President the next time. If that should come to pass and you Democrats should treat us as we have treated you for a quarter of a century, there would be wailing in our camp. We have fixed up this little bill to keep our friends in office should that calamity happen to us; that is, all our friends whose appointments are not subject to our power of confirmation. Those of our friends over whom we have the power of confirmation we will take care of through that power. Now, if you will give up the spoils idea and agree not to disturb our office-holders who have raised all this stench, when your party wins I shall say that you are fit to rule this country."

This is a fair specimen of the chaff with which many an old Democratic bird was caught in the passage of that law; and no doubt it was intended to meet such apparently fair propositions that the President made his patriotic promises. It is to be hoped that the President can now judge of the sincerity of those professions. It is to be hoped that his eyes are now opened to the true character of the men with whom he has to deal, when he sees them, not content with the retention of all their partisans within the scope of this law and the retention of nine-tenths of their partisans not within its scope, still resisting on the flimsiest pretexts, at the risk of delaying the business of the country, the removal of the one-tenth whom he has seen proper to oust.

How he can expect his administration to prove a success when conducted in great part by his enemies, who would be delighted with its failure, is something I can not imagine. How it is expected that he can unearth the frauds and expose the corruptions necessarily incident to a long lease of power while surrounded by those who helped to commit them, if any such exist, and who have the keys to the requisite information, is a problem beyond my power of solution. Yet this is the real reform the people demand. His officers in every Department are literally surrounded by Republican spies, and he can not make the slightest move without taking his enemies into his confidence. It is a complete case of trying to serve the Lord with the devil as an active partner!

But if this law were constitutional, which it is not; if it were fair to all classes of citizens, which it is not; if it were just in its operations upon the one party as well as the other, which it assuredly is not—still I would deny that it is wise and businesslike. I believe it is not a better method than the old one; and the various heads of Departments have not yet said that the clerks given to them under the civil-service law are better than those they had before. They do say, however, that it saves them a vast deal of importunity, and that is the most they have said in its favor. I have heard of many instances where the appointees under the new system have proven quite as inefficient and as awkward as any others.

There seems to be an impression that the further you can get from the people the less importunity there will be and the better officers you will get. In my judgment the man who can not endure these importunities is entirely too good and too patriotic and too virtuous to hold office in a free country, and should be permitted to retire beyond the reach of such an annoyance, unless he can say that he has not himself spent the greater part of his life in importuning other people for office. In my judgment there is no more safe or purer source of office in a free country than the people; and the man who desires to get away from that source should immediately become the subject of the like desire on their part to get away from him. I believe that when executive officers were appointed under the old system, on the recommendation of members of Congress, if you please, better selections were made than have been or will be made by the Civil Service Commission, and I know they were more responsive to the popular will. To say nothing of the Presidential responsibility which I have already discussed, there is superadded the responsibility of the Representatives who are fresh from the people, directly accountable to them twice as often as the Executive, and who have also a personal acquaintance with the constituents whom they recommend. Most of them have had this personal knowledge for a lifetime, and are, therefore, infinitely better judges of their fitness than would be three strangers who may see them for the first time when they appear for examination, and when in the brief space of perhaps an hour they may ask them a few questions.

Perhaps it will be admitted that the Representatives of the people in Congress are quite as honest and as patriotic as the three commissioners who constitute the board. In addition it may be said that they, the Representatives, are better able to testify to the moral fitness of applicants, which is after all the greater matter, and which can not be enlightened in the slightest by a competitive or any other examination. In fact, the method of selection by this law is altogether impracticable and unbusinesslike. It would not be adopted by any corporation or business firm in the United States, and I venture to say that it never has been. The college training which would enable an applicant to state promptly "what causes led to the war of 1812," or "through what States a straight line would pass if extended from New York to New Orleans," or to "state the Kinetic theory of the constitution of gases," would give him every time the advantage over a better and much more practical man who had never been to college.

The humbuggery of this whole examination business as a test of fitness for clerical position is well illustrated by a flaming advertisement which I hold in my hand, and which reads as follows:

A collection of examinations and answers, selected by a competent and experienced professor, so as to enable any person, after their intelligent review, to undergo a thoroughly successful civil-service examination. Every person desiring to be employed by the Government should have it. Send 10 cents for a copy.

The only sensible way to obtain good employés anywhere in any business is to select them yourself and try them. If they should prove good, keep them; if they should prove bad, discharge them.

Another objection to the establishment by this law of a privileged irresponsible class of officials may be summed up in the language of Shakespeare—"the insolence of office." No better illustration of the almost divine genius of that great man can be found than in the acuteness displayed by him in making Hamlet, when recounting the evils and grievances which render life insupportable, mention the "insolence of office" as one of the chief. Who that has ever visited this capital city and has had any business in the various Departments of the Government has not been made aware in the bitterness of his soul of the full extent and measure of the poet's meaning!

The officer who makes his superiors and his betters, as well as the humble and the dependent, cool their heels in his antechamber and drink to the last dregs the cup of his insolence, is unconsciously a more eloquent advocate than I am for the frequency of elections and for the making officials directly responsible to their masters, the people. No French dancing master, no court master of ceremonies ever taught so effectual a school of politeness as is taught to Government officials by the knowledge that for every insolent act and word they will have to account speedily to the people. Is this wrong? Is it necessarily a bad system of government which makes its officials polite and kind and attentive? Is it desirable to increase this insolence of office by establishing a European bureaucracy as far as possible independent of and removed from the people? If so, then our whole system of government is wrong, freedom is wrong, republican institutions are wrong, human nature is wrong. Instead of taking the people and human nature as we find them and governing the people the best we can in the interest of individual liberty, we should listen to the solemn asses who at all times have infested the earth, and who wish to consider things and treat them as entirely different from what God has made them.

The debate which occurred on the passage of the civil-service bill was the occasion for the exhibition of considerable histrionic talent arising from the necessity of playing at the same time difficult and very different rôles. The Democratic Senators charged corruption on the party in power as a necessity for its passage boldly and loudly, but fought very shy of the suggestion of their fellow-Democrats that they were preparing to continue in power by this bill the party which had been guilty of the corruption which rendered such an act necessary. The Republicans adopted the plea which lawyers term "confession and avoidance;" admitting the corruption charged sub modo, but went away back to the days of Andrew Jackson in search of a tu quoque, and manifested much anxiety by the passage of that bill to correct the morals and evil doings of the dead, scouting the idea that they sought to obtain any advantage for the living. Both were wrong and wide of the mark.

The corruption of which the country complained and has complained for some twenty years was not among the class of officials who were covered by that bill. No outcry had ever been raised against the poor clerks, copyists, and messengers of the Departments. The stench which for years had assailed the nostrils of the nation had in every instance been created by those who had been nominated to their offices by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The thousand minnows which swam through the water, however they may have disported themselves, had never been able to cause a ripple on its surface; it was the whales and the sharks which lashed the waters into fury and tore the nets of the law into shreds. The operations of the Black Friday conspirators, Credit Mobilier thieves, whisky rings, freedmen's savings-banks robbers, Sanborn contracts, star-route contracts, and such other like projects of villainy were the things that alarmed the honest sentiment of the country and called for reform.

To answer this call as Republican Senators pretended to do by such a bill as this was a preposterous and contemptible subterfuge. It was a regular case of giving Smith medicine for Brown's ailments. To punish a corrupt secretary or auditor they administered discipline to a guiltless clerk. Even had that been good medical practice, it was an absurdity to pretend to punish the clerk by providing that he should hold office for life, instead of discharging him. It was a spectacle too in another sense worthy of the attention of the country, in that it presented the leaders of the great party standing up and confessing that their own evil practices and corruptions demanded this reform. The sincerity of this repentance, however, will be apparent when it is considered that the confessions were not made in good faith but in articulo mortis. Having held and abused power for twenty-three years they saw by unerring instinct that the day of retribution was at hand; that the people were determined upon reform; not by such poor devices as were provided by that act, but by a change in the entire control and personnel of the Government. They, therefore, "cast an anchor to windward," and this law was the result. And it is falsely entitled. It is not an act to improve and regulate the civil service of the country. To all intents and purposes it was the last will and testament of the Republican party; and my chief regret is that a Democratic President was compelled to become its executor instead of its administrator de bonis non.

Let us examine a moment the falsity of its pretenses. If the corruption of the Government which called for legislation lay with the clerks and minor officials, the remedy which would naturally suggest itself to every man of common sense would have been simply to turn them out. This law provides that they shall not be turned out, but kept in.

If the corruption of the Government lay with the higher officials, how could the punishment of the minor officials reform that corruption? A fortiori, how could their promotion reform it?

If the clerks were bad because they had been appointed under the spoils system, how do we improve the clerks by this law, which keeps every one of them in office and excepts them from its operations?

If the clerks were good under the spoils system, then what was the matter with the system? In short, if we had good clerks under the old system, then no change was needed; if we had bad clerks under the old system we have them yet, for they are all in office except such as have died. A system, however good, is worth nothing unless it be put in force.

By the civil-service law we contented ourselves with a high-sounding and virtuous enactment against corruption and incompetency, and at the same time exempted from its operations every man of whom corruption and incompetency were complained. We did more than that. Owing to the fact that the Republican party was sectional in its character and came almost altogether from the Northern States of this Union, it naturally filled the offices with partisans from the same section. And notwithstanding that prior to the passage of the civil-service act laws were enacted requiring that places of the Government should be distributed throughout the States and Territories in proportion to population as nearly as might be, these laws were constantly disregarded, and at the time this law went into effect at least five-sixths of all the officers of the Government in number and importance were from one section of the Union. Common fairness required that in the inauguration of a new system of appointment there should have been a new adjustment, so that all might start equal, and all the different sections of the country be put upon the same footing.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], during the pendency of the bill, offered an amendment to it providing that all incumbents should likewise be compelled to stand the examination as outside applicants, so that the inefficient who were in office might be expelled. That amendment was rejected by a strict party vote; whereby the Republican supporters of the bill declared that the true intent and meaning of it was to provide that their partisans should be secured in their places against the will of the people in the then coming election. The bill also perpetuated this injustice to one section of the country by failing to provide that all future appointments should go to those States which lacked their proportion until the equilibrium should have been restored. No effort has since been made in any way to correct this injustice, but in effect the commission has declared that it must be perpetual.

Recently the members of the commission appeared before the Civil Service Reform Committee in the House of Representatives, and, while they acknowledged the gross injustice that had been done one section of the country, advised strongly against trying to remedy it, for the reason that it would make the law unpopular in the North, where its chief supporters were. That is to say, they advised that injustice must be perpetuated because justice would offend the stronger party! That is to say, that the South must submit to being denied an equal participation in the government of their country because the North, perhaps, would not like it? That is to say, that the States thus deprived, being Democratic States, the Democratic party and a Democratic administration must be the instruments to sustain a law for the benefit of the Republican party, lest the Republican party should not like it!

By an examination of the "Blue Book" or "Official Register" just prior to the date of the passage of the civil-service law it will be seen that in the Departments at Washington there were 7,273 employés, of whom but 1,353 were from the South. The State of North Carolina of this number was credited with 71, and of these 71 quite a number were persons who had perhaps never seen the State, certainly had no residence there. They were distributed in the various Departments as follows: Department of the Interior, 17; Department of State, 1; Department of the Navy, none; Department of War, 1; Department of the Treasury, 45; Post-Office Department, 6; Department of Justice, 1. Now, considering that North Carolina is one of the thirty-eight States and has a population of 1,500,000, and is entitled, therefore, to at least five times that number of positions under the Government if she had her rights under the law, and that the Board of Civil Service Commissioners refused to remedy this injustice, it can not be wondered at that there is discontent in that State and in all others similarly situated.

The reply to this and all other objections to this law is almost invariably the application of epithets. The President himself has not refrained from this. In his tender and touching farewell to the putative parent of this great sentimental humbug, Commissioner Eaton (who, alas! lingered instead of going), he spoke of those who opposed this law as "the worst elements of both parties." However little this unflattering classification may disturb me, it would be rather serious, if true, when applied to the party which put him in the position to say it officially. For there is no earthly doubt in my mind but that a large majority of the Democratic party are opposed to the whole scheme from beginning to end. If its worst element then is in a majority the party is in a bad way—so bad, indeed, as to be beyond the reach of such feeble remedies as this diluted reform.

In the last report of the Civil Service Commission, which I have been enabled to see only a short while before speaking, the same lofty tone is exhibited toward those who oppose this bill.

They say "the greatest opposition to the new system has come mainly from a few members of Congress, some State and Federal officials, and many small politicians, none of whom have any such knowledge or responsibility, and whose participation in appointments has always been a simple intermeddling and usurpation." Just how far this insolent and disrespectful tone toward the members of Congress and many small politicians who have "neither the knowledge nor responsibilities" of administration will go toward procuring the "liberal care and jealous protection of Congress" which the President invokes for this law and its guardians, the Representatives of these "worst elements" in the House must determine.

In the discussion upon the passage of the bill the term of reproach, "spoilsman," was frequently used and is still being used against its opponents, chiefly by Republican orators and Mugwump papers. Having had an uninterrupted swig at the Treasury for nearly a quarter of a century, during which time there was more money expended and stolen ten times over than in all the life of the Government before; and having excluded their adversaries from participation by test oaths, constitutional amendments, and unconstitutional laws so long as possible; and having finally, in the last hours before death, provided for the retention of their friends in office even after the people had solemnly decreed their ejection, they now sit benignly in their places, and, under the shelter of this act, cry "spoilsman" at every poor Democrat who may say a word in opposition.

The behavior of the Republican advocates of this law about the time of its passage was not only remarkable, it was shameless. In the face of their allegations that the spoils system was corrupt, and that by it we could not possibly get good and competent officials, they not only defeated by a solid vote in the Senate the amendment of Mr. PUGH, as I have stated, requiring their friends already in to submit to examination, but they made haste to fill every possible vacancy with their partisans before the law took effect. It is an open secret that on Saturday, the 14th of July, some of the heads of Departments in this city spent the entire day and night, far into Sunday morning, in filling every vacancy, promoting their friends and kin and degrading their political enemies. The law was to go into effect on the 15th of July. Quite a number of new clerks had been provided for by the appropriation bills for the fiscal year beginning July 1, and a full supply of applicants had already passed the civil-service examination and stood by waiting for the law to go into effect. But when the offices opened on Monday, the 16th, not a vacant place was anywhere to be found; every one was occupied by a Republican or kinsman of the appointing officer. And the men who perpetrated this fraud on their own law, with the cheek of a town cow, cry "spoilsman!" at every man who denounces their hypocrisy; and Democrats are found who by their votes here sustain these men in the retention of their ill-gotten spoils, and who seem to think that fraud and hypocrisy constitute the necessary overture to the grand symphony of reform.

The meaning of all this is, the Republicans desire office from pure patriotism; the Democrats wish office simply for the emoluments! For a Republican to hold office after the people have told him to leave is commenable and pure; for a Democrat to wish to get one after the people have declared for him is reprehensible and base! Now, grant that the offices belong to neither party, but to the people, for whose benefit they were instituted; when the people have once spoken and declared by a constitutional majority that the Republicans must go out and the Democrats come in, which of the two displays the most attachment to the spoils; he who desires them with the consent of the people, or he who holds on to them in defiance of the wishes of the people? If the owner of a house desire his two guests to depart, whether of the two is the gentleman, he who retires on the first intimation of his host, or he who lingers, claims the house, and waits to be kicked out?

The force of this has been acknowledged by many fair-minded Republican Senators and Republicans everywhere in whom the common spirit of manhood has not been quenched by the greed for office. Hundreds all over the country have voluntarily retired from positions which they acknowledged belonged to their opponents. It is not from such that the cry of spoilsman comes. A Republican who shrieks out this cry in defense of his own spoils is entitled to some respect, however, for he but obeys the ordinary dictates of a very natural selfishness. But what should be said, what can be said, in defense of a Democrat, who, having secured his coveted office, and having secured it, too, by the extremest spoils-partisan methods, turns upon the men through whom he got it, his fellow-Democrats, and besmirches them as spoilsmen because they exhibit a very natural desire to reap the fruits of the very same victory by which he was benefited?

Conceive of an old-fashioned fighting Democrat, who for forty years had stood by his party through good and evil report, because he believed in its principles; who battled for it when it had no offices to give; many times when it was buried beneath such vast majorities as left scarce a prospect of earthly resurrection; often oppressed by a weight of odium sufficient to cow the bravest spirit, under the influence of which the faithful became even as the "few names in Sardis who had not defiled their garments"—when the very name of Democrat became a convertible term with that of copperhead, rebel, and traitor—fancy his unconquered and undismayed soul still working for his principles, still watching for the dawn, still waiting with prayerfulness for the hope of his political Israel, thanking God for each town, township, or county victory which showed that his principles still lived in the hearts of his countrymen, and were growing because they were immortal—quicker and quicker throbs his heart, higher and higher rises his joy as stronghold after stronghold is carried, as State after State is captured in spite of unconstitutional laws and governmental interference, in spite of bayonets glittering at the polls, in spite of that gross and unblushing fraud which is the supplement of despair; and, lastly, imagine if you can the hot tide of triumphant joy with which he saw in November, 1884, the banners of Democracy full high advanced and successful over all the Union, and his party once more in control of the great destinies of his country. When the hope of his soul had thus been at last realized, and his old eyes had been permitted to behold the great salvation, when the bonfires kindled in a thousand cities and hamlets had burned down, and the feasting had ended, and the oratory and all the elements of rejoicing had subsided, and the new administration had begun its career amid the prayers and blessings of all Democratic hearts, imagine, I say, this old, faithful, and honest man of principle coming to Washington, in the simplicity of his heart, bringing certificates from his neighbors of his character and services, and modestly asking for a position, naturally supposing that the king in making up his jewels would remember his faithful servants. But imagine that old gentleman's disappointment when something like the following occurs between him and the Government's representative:

Old Democrat. "I have come to make application for some position under the Government which I am competent to fill."

Government Representative. "You are too old; under the laws of the Republic men over forty-five years old are not permitted to take office."

O. D. "But I see men in places here who are sixty years old."

G. R. "Oh, they were in when the law was enacted, and it does not operate on them."

O. D. "Well, if such be the law, I submit; it may be that I am too old. But here is my boy; he is young and active and well educated; give him a position."

G. R. "We can not do it; there is no vacancy."

O. D. "No vacancy? Well, make one. There is a rank Republican. That man has been our bitterest enemy. He has denounced me and my party as traitors to our country again and again. Turn him out and put in my son or my neighbor's son."

G. R. "It can not be, sir. The law forbids it. And, besides, if there were a vacancy your son could not get the place unless he stood an examination by the Board of Civil Service Commissioners and secured the favor of that board over many others."

O. D. "Well! well! Did all those Republicans in there have to stand such an examination and get their places in the same way? If so, and they were smarter than the Democrats, again I say I will have to submit."

G. R. "Oh, no, my dear sir; no. You see they were all in when the law was enacted. They got in by that old corrupt method which we call 'the spoil' system. But being in, you see they had a sort of vested right to their places, and the law does not disturb vested rights, that is Republican rights, except for very serious cause."

O. D. "Then it seems to me there is nothing here for me or mine, and all that talk during the campaign about corruption in office and turning the rascals out was a trick and a lie. It appears that there were no rascals in, or if there were, you like rascals better than you do honest men, and so keep them."

G. R. "Old man, you had better go home; you are behind the times. This is an age of civil-service reform. Men can no longer be rewarded by office for party work; that is, humble men like you and your son. The big ones may be paid that way; for that is true reform. But when such men as you confess that they want office they are spoilsmen, and that is what you are. I am ashamed of you! Away with you!"

This final and insulting reply is the iron which enters his soul, and he retires crushed and wounded beyond recovery. The sense of disappointment, of injustice, of humiliation, the ingratitude of those for whom he labored, are too much for him to endure, and the enthusiasm of his life is quenched forever. The man who calls him a spoilsman, and charges that he served his party for the sake of office only, foully belies a better man than himself.

This, Mr. President, is no fancied picture. There are thousands and thousands of just such men, and we meet them or hear from them every day. They are the strength of the Democratic party to-day; they have been its refuge and its shield in the past; they preserved it from annihilation in its darkest hours. I am not quite sure that they will continue its champions in the future. I can well see that they might be willing to concede any fair and impartial distribution of the places under the Government on principle of merit or anything else that patriotism might demand of them, but they will not submit to the disfranchisement of themselves and their children. Mark what I say! And you will not improve the matter by impeaching the purity of their motives and bestowing epithets upon them. They will not fight to win great Democratic victories for Republican benefit. They will not continue to rally to the bugles of the party and win hard-fought battles merely that their enemies may remain in possession of the field. They will not preserve the discipline and organization of their splendid line of battle and charge with their ancient courage if the epaulets and honors which they win are to be bestowed upon their adversaries, or the cowards who skulked in the rear, or the mercenaries who hung upon the flanks of the contending parties, alternately firing upon each host. The mass of the people on both sides demand an open fight and upright and downright dealing after the fight. They believe, too, in the common virtues of humanity, among the most noble of which is reckoned gratitude; and so do I. They believe that if a man's friends take him up and enable him after a great struggle to arrive at the point coveted by his ambition he owes something to them; and so do I. They believe that, other things being equal, in the bestowal of favors that man should give preference to his friends over his enemies; and so do I. They believe that the man who is lacking in the ordinary sentiment of gratitude may be likewise wanting in other kindred and cardinal virtues; and so do I.

And yet, Mr. President, I believe in reform—such reform as the people want and have been wanting for ten years or more. Between those who call me a spoilsman and myself there is perhaps only a difference of definition. They believe that "reform" consists in a Democratic administration operated by Republican agents; I do not. They believe in keeping Republicans in office by law after the people have declared they shall go out; I do not. They believe in ignoring the people and their representatives as far as possible in the selection of officials; I do not. They believe there can be no sincere reform unless Republicans are the chief beneficiaries thereof; I do. And lastly, I believe that as good material for all civil officials is to be found in the Democratic party as in any other, and that it is the right and duty of a Democratic administration to select that material and none other as the implements of reform; they do not.

Let me warn men against those who assume to be above the homely virtues and common frailties of our race, and who affect to inhabit the untrodden altitudes of a world different from the one where our Creator has placed us, and deny being of the earth, earthy. A man too good in politics or religion is quite as reprehensible as one too bad, and I am quite sure he is a greater nuisance. For the most part they are men who have failed in securing the objects of their own ambition, and may be described either as political old maids whose blood has been turned to vinegar by a failure to secure lovers before their unappreciated charms had fled, or as the grass widows of politics who have failed to retain the lovers they had won by artifice and fraud. They are men who desire to conduct politics without the aid of the politicians; who believe that the most successful way to operate mechanics is to work without implements.

Let such, a God's name, on fine wheat be fed.
And let us honest Democrats eat barley bread.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. According to the unanimous order of the Senate the unfinished business will be resumed, which is the bill relating to the admission of Washington.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DOLPH. For a moment.

Mr. TELLER. I was out of the Chamber when the Senator from North Carolina referred to what transpired just previous to the civil-service act going into force in July, 1883. I understand he made the statement that the Departments of the Government were engaged at that time very assiduously and industriously in providing places for people during the last days of the old system. I wish to say to the Senator, and I think I can speak for every Department of the Government as it existed at that time, that he has been misinformed on the subject; that the business of the Departments proceeded in the regular way, and in the regular way only; and that as vacancies occurred they were filled. I can understand very well where the Senator may have got his statement, because such a statement did go out and was circulated in the public press uncontradicted, but nevertheless it is a mistake, and such is not the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 277) for the relief of James M. Lowry; and

A bill (H. R. 6663) for the relief of Thomas P. Westmoreland.

The bill (H. R. 4009) for the relief of Ann B. Hubbard, administratrix, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

JOHN F. SLATER.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 115) providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John F. Slater, was read twice by its title.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am informed that the Committee on the Library have agreed upon that identical measure, if they have not reported it. Let the joint resolution lie on the table until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie on the table, if there be no objection.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, after the exhaustive discussion in the Senate of the bill for the admission into the Union of Southern Dakota, involving as it did many of the questions which will probably influence Senators in voting upon the bill under consideration, and after the able and elaborate presentation, yesterday, of the claims of Washington Territory to be admitted into the Union, by the Senator from Connecticut, I do not expect to be able to present to the Senate much of value in addition to what has already been said. And yet, representing as I do, in part, the people of the State whose northern boundary forms the southern boundary of the Territory now asking admission as a State, a State whose people are connected with the people of that Territory by a common history of hardship and adventure in the early settlement of the country, who are bound to them by strong commercial and business ties, and whose future is indissolubly linked with theirs, I do not feel at liberty to remain wholly silent.

I listened to the debate upon the bill for the admission of Dakota with attention, to learn, if I could, what were considered by Senators to be the requisites for the admission of a Territory to the sisterhood of the States. If I correctly understood the position of the Senators who opposed the passage of that bill, it was that there is no binding rule established, by precedent or otherwise, upon that subject.

Waiving for the present the questions of how far the precedents ought to govern the action of Congress upon this bill, and to what extent Congress is bound by agreement with its people to admit the Territory of Washington into the Union as a State, I will consider briefly the claims of the Territory for admission. I assume that the prerequisites which can be reasonably demanded for the admission of a new State are the following:

A sufficient territory; a sufficient population; institutions conformable to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and not repugnant to a republican form of government; sufficient resources and financial ability to support a State government; and the desire of the people themselves for admission.

In my judgment none of these things are wanting in the present case.

I will direct attention first to the area of the proposed State.

Washington Territory is a part of the territory whose jurisdiction was long in dispute between the United States and Great Britain, but which was formally declared to be in the United States by the treaty of 1846.

By an act of Congress approved August 14, 1848, Oregon Territory was organized, embracing all the territory of the United States west of the Rocky Mountains north of latitude 42° north. It contained 308,052 square miles.

Washington Territory was organized by an act of Congress, approved March 3, 1853, and embraced all that portion of Oregon Territory north of the Columbia River from the mouth of that river to the point of intersection with latitude 46° north, and north of latitude 46° north, from that point to the Rocky Mountains, and contained 123,022 square miles.

Oregon was admitted as a State by act of Congress approved February 14, 1859, with an area of 95,274 square miles. All that portion of the Territory lying east of the Snake River from the point of its intersection with the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude to the mouth of the Ouyhee River, and east of a line drawn from that point directly south to the forty-second parallel of north latitude, was incorporated within the boundaries of Washington Territory.

By act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, Idaho Territory was organized out of territory taken from Washington, which left the area of Washington Territory as it is at present—69,994 square miles, 3,114 square miles of which is water surface, and 66,880 square miles, or 44,796,160 acres, land surface. It is estimated that of the present area of Washington Territory, after deducting the area of Puget Sound and of the mountains unfit for cultivation, there remain 35,000,000 acres, of which about 20,000,000 acres is timber land, 10,000,000 acres table land, and 5,000,000 acres rich alluvial bottoms.

The area of the proposed State is, in round numbers, about 90,000 square miles, and is exceeded only by that of five States, namely, California, Colorado, Nevada, Texas, and Oregon. A few comparisons will assist in comprehending the vast dimensions of the proposed State and of the other Pacific coast States.

If you will take the map of the United States and trace the western boundaries of Washington Territory, Oregon, and California from Cape Flattery to the southern boundary of California you will find the distance to be 1,620 miles. The distance from Cape Flattery, following the channel of the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the Canal de Haro, to the point where the forty-ninth parallel of latitude intersects the main channel between Vancouver Island and the mainland, and which is the extreme northern boundary of Washington Territory, is at least 100 miles. If Washington Territory is admitted into the Union there will be three Pacific coast States with a shore-line upon the Pacific of 1,620 miles.

The shore-line upon the Atlantic, from the Saint Croix River, the northern boundary of Maine, to Saint Mary's River, the southern boundary of Georgia, is 1,450 miles, upon which thirteen States of the Union are bounded in whole or in part, namely, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. With 170 miles more of shore-line upon the Pacific Ocean than the thirteen States named have on the Atlantic, three States will be represented here by six Senators, while the thirteen are represented by twenty-six Senators.

Again, California has 157,801 square miles, Oregon 95,274 square miles, Washington Territory 69,994 square miles, North Idaho (estimated) 20,000 square miles, making a total of 343,069 square miles. The thirteen States mentioned upon the Atlantic coast have an aggregate area of 309,652 square miles. The three Pacific States will, therefore, not only have 170 miles more of seacoast, not counting the coast of Washington Territory north of Cape Flattery, but a territory exceeding the aggregate territory of the thirteen Atlantic States named, by 33,417 square miles—more than territory enough to make twenty-five States of the size of Rhode Island.

Fractional portions of the State of Colorado and of the Territory of New Mexico and a very small portion of the Territory of Wyoming lie west of the Rocky Mountains. It is not likely that more than four States will be created out of Washington, Idaho, Utah, and Arizona Territories, which will make seven States west of the Rocky Mountains. East of the Rocky Mountains there are at present thirty-five States, including Colorado, whose territory, as I have said, extends west of the Rocky Mountains. And there is a probability that out of Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, New Mexico, and Indian Territories will be created from seven to ten more States, and a possibility that Texas may be divided into four States. Assuming that four new States will be formed from the Territories of Washington, Idaho, Arizona, and Utah, the total area of the seven Pacific States would be 776,334 square miles. The area of all the States and Territories, excluding Alaska, is 3,008,616 square miles, 2,232,283 square miles of which lie east of the Rocky Mountains and west of the Rocky Mountains within the boundaries of New Mexico and Colorado.

There are thirty-five States already within the portion last mentioned, with a prospect of the number being increased to forty-five, in which case more than one-fourth of the entire territory of the States would be divided into seven Pacific States, and less than three-fourths would be divided into forty-five States.

In this connection I make a suggestion which I commend to the consideration of the opponents of this measure, if there are such. Washington Territory is divided by the Cascade Mountains into two sections—eastern and western—nearly equal in area and population. Each section has territory enough for a State larger than any one of ten of the present States of the Union. The population of the Territory has undoubtedly doubled during the last four years, and before the United State census of 1890 is taken it will have more than doubled again.

There is already a growing sentiment in the Territory in favor of a division of the Territory on the line of the Cascade Mountains. Suppose, and the conjecture is within the bounds of probability, that the present application of the people for the admission of the Territory into the Union is rejected, and that after the next census the people of each section, Eastern and Western Washington, with double the necessary population to entitle them to a Representative in Congress under the present apportionment, and it being also manifest that they have the resources and financial ability to sustain a State government, come to Congress demanding a division of the Territory and the admission of each section as a State, what satisfactory answer under such a showing can be made to them? If it is answered that Congress and not the people of the Territory will determine the dimensions and boundaries of the State, I will suggest that if the admission of new States is to be determined by questions of political expediency, when the sentiment of Congress is such that the Territory can be admitted at all, it is just as likely to be admitted as two States as without division.

Coming now to the question of population, it is true that there is no absolute rule as to the population which should be required for the admission of a new State into the Union. The only provision of the Constitution upon the subject of admission is found in section 3 of article 4, and is as follows:

New States may be admitted by Congress into the Union.

It will be seen that the power of Congress to admit new States is not restricted. A rule by which a new State should be required to possess a population equal to the number fixed as the basis of representation in Congress at the time of admission would not, I think, be an unjust one. The Constitution has provided, however, for a contingency in which a State may have less population than that. The second section of the first article of the Constitution declares that "the number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every 30,000, but each State shall have at least one Representative."

It can be satisfactorily demonstrated, I think, that there is now within the territorial limits of the proposed State, a population much greater than that fixed as the present basis of Congressional representation. After a careful estimate, based upon the vote of the Territory for the last decade, the population of Washington and Northern Idaho, as shown by the Tenth Census and the vote cast at the election in 1884, I place the present population of Washington Territory at 185,000. The population of Washington Territory in 1880, according to the Tenth Census, was 75,116. The number of votes cast at the election in 1880 was 15,823. The ratio of population to voters in 1880 was, therefore, 4.747 and a fraction—so near to 4¾ that, for convenience of calculation, the latter figures may be adopted as the ratio. The vote of the Territory at the Territorial election of 1884 was:

For Delegate	41,842
Not voting for Delegate	1,478
Total vote	43,320
Females voting	8,368
Making number of male voters	34,952

Adopting the ratio of voters in 1880, i.e., 4¾ inhabitants for every male voter, and there appears to have been on the 4th of November, 1884, in Washington Territory alone a population of 166,022.

According to the Tenth Census, the population of that part of Idaho included within the boundaries of the proposed State was 6,983. The number of votes cast in that subdivision of the Territory at the Territorial election of 1880 was 1,235, which gives a ratio of one voter to every 5.65 inhabitants. The vote of this portion of Idaho at the Territorial election of 1884 was 2,831. Estimated at the ratio of voters to the population in 1880, the population of North Idaho at the date of the last Territorial election was 15,995; which would give to the Territory included within the boundaries of the proposed new State on the 4th of November, 1884, a population of 182,017. At the rate of the increase of population of Washington Territory for the last three years, the population of the Territory must have increased materially by immigration since the November election in 1884, and must now amount to at least 185,000, as above estimated.

Of course absolute certainty can not be claimed for these estimates. They are made, however, upon the basis of ascertained facts, and certainly upon the most satisfactory basis which can be adopted for such an estimate, and they may be accepted without question as approximating very nearly, certainly within from one to five thousand of the actual population of the Territory.

The ratio of population to the number of voters in the Territory has not decreased since the census of 1880 was taken. The probability is that it has increased. Within the last four years the facilities for reaching that Territory have been greatly increased, and the immigration has been mainly composed of families. I have no doubt that the ratio of population to male voters at this time is at least 5 to 1, which would give the Territory a still greater population than shown by the above estimates. And then, in estimating the population upon the basis of the vote at the last election, it ought not to be forgotten that a very large portion of the recent immigration into the Territory was within the six months immediately preceding the November election, among which were no qualified voters.

I am aware that the returns of the census taken by the Territory in 1883 show the total population at that time to have been 92,508, and the returns of the census taken by the county assessors in the spring of 1885 show the population to have then been 129,438, an increase during the two years of 36,930. But there is no doubt that the taking of the census being incidental to the other duties of the county assessors, and the law under which it was taken being insufficient to secure thoroughness and accuracy, the work was done in a negligent manner and that the returns are very imperfect. As was stated by the Senator from Connecticut, Governor Squire, in his annual message to the Legislative Assembly of the Territory at its last session, said:

> The census returns of the Territory are notoriously incomplete, and can not be taken as a true and sufficient exhibit of the actual population. For example, a communication signed by the officers of Lincoln County claims that a correct census would increase the reported population of that county fully 40 per cent. The law is manifestly imperfect, because there is no penalty attached to non-compliance therewith. * * *
> The Territorial auditor writes me as follows: "Had the census been properly taken under an adequate law, the population for 1885 would certainly have been shown to be above 175,000."

But even these notoriously imperfect returns fairly show the population in the proposed State to be greater than the number required for representation in Congress under the present ratio. A year has elapsed since the census of 1885 was taken. By that census, as has been stated, there appeared to be in Washington Territory a population of 129,438. The increase for two years was shown to have been 39,930. As the immigration was much larger than ever before in the history of the Territory, the increase during the year since the last census was taken must have exceeded the annual increase for the preceding two years. But, supposing it to have been the same, 18,465, on the basis of the census taken by the county assessors under the Territorial law, the Territory would now be shown to have at least a population of 147,903.

I am informed by Hon. JOHN HAILEY, Delegate in Congress from Idaho Territory, and others, that the population of Northern Idaho has increased at least 30 per cent. since the election in November, 1884; that in Shoshone County, where the vote in 1884 was only 858, there has been at a school meeting held since that election, in a single school district in the county, over 2,000 votes cast. Add 30 per cent. to the estimated population of Northern Idaho at the election in November, 1884, and its present population would appear to be 20,793, which, added to the estimated population of Washington Territory at the present time, estimated on the basis of the Territorial census of 1883 and 1885, would make the population of the proposed State of Washington at this time 168,696.

If there is any standard as to the population required to entitle a Territory to admission as a State one would naturally expect it would be determined by ascertaining what population had been heretofore regarded by Congress as requisite for admission. Tried by any rule which has yet been suggested the population of Washington Territory is sufficient to entitle it to admission. The following States had less population at the last census previous to their admission than Washington Territory had in 1880, namely:

	Population.		Population.
Kentucky	73,677	Mississippi and Alabama (jointly)	40,000
Tennessee	61,247	Florida	54,470
Ohio	60,000	Iowa	43,112
Indiana	24,000	Wisconsin	30,945
Illinois	20,000	Oregon	13,294
Michigan	31,639	Nevada	6,858
Minnesota	6,077	Nebraska	28,841
Missouri	66,557	Colorado	39,864
Arkansas	30,388

While Louisiana with a population of 76,556, Vermont with 85,425, California with 92,507, did not greatly exceed the population of Washington Territory shown by the census of 1880. Not one of the States except Maine and West Virginia, both of which were formed out of other States, when admitted had as large a population as Washington Territory now has.

At the census succeeding the admission of the several new States the following had less population than Washington Territory has to-day:

	Population.		Population.
Vermont	154,446	Missouri	140,455
Tennessee	105,602	Arkansas	97,574
Louisiana	152,923	Florida	87,445
Indiana	147,178	Minnesota	172,023
Mississippi	75,448	Oregon	52,465
Alabama	127,901	Nevada	42,491
Illinois	56,062	Nebraska	122,993

Maine was formed by a division of Massachusetts; West Virginia by a division of Virginia; Vermont was a colony of New York, and Kentucky a portion of Virginia; Texas was an organized independent State before her admission into the Union. Twenty of the new States were organized out of the territory of the United States. Four of the twenty only had by previous census a population sufficient to entitle them to a Representative in Congress under the ratio then established. These were: Tennessee, Ohio, Missouri, and Louisiana. Eight States had not the necessary population to entitle them to a Representative at the date of their admission, namely, Illinois, Florida, California, Oregon, Kansas, Nebraska, Nevada, and Colorado.

The educational system of the Territory, while comparatively inexpensive, is efficient. In 1885, according to the report of the superintendent of public instruction, the number of children in the Territory between the ages of five and twenty-one was 37,256; number of pupils enrolled in the public schools, 26,497; number of schools, 744; number of school buildings 723; number of graded schools, 24; amount paid for school purposes within the year, $287,029.33. With the increased prosperity of the Territory and the large additions to its population within the last few years, interest in the cause of education has been greatly stimulated. New, expensive, and commodious school buildings have been erected in the principal towns, additional private educational institutions have been established, and there is to-day no Territory or State of the Union better supplied, in proportion to its population, with the means of securing to all its children of school age an ordinary English education than Washington Territory.

I learn from the last annual report of Governor Squire, which is full of valuable statistical information, that the number of private institutions of learning in the Territory, consisting of colleges, seminaries, and academies, is 24, at which there are 1,836 pupils in attendance, instructed by 91 professors and teachers.

By the organic act there were reserved to the Territory, for school purposes, sections 16 and 36 of the public lands in each township. By the bill under consideration sections 16 and 36 in each township, all the swamp lands within the State, together with 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within the State, will be granted to it for school purposes; and permission is also given the State to use for the same object the 500,000 acres of land inuring to it upon its admission into the Union, by the provision of section 2378 of the Revised Statutes. In addition to these valuable concessions there is granted to the new State, seventy-five sections of land for the support of an agricultural college. A minimum price of $5 per acre is fixed for these lands, and the proceeds of the sales of all lands granted for school purposes, together with the 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of lands within the State, are constituted a permanent fund, the interest only of which can be expended for the support of public schools. These provisions of the bill will secure to the State a magnificent permanent endowment of its common schools.

Even in the more recently settled portions of Eastern Washington the same thrift, economy, and good order which characterize the older communities of the States, are observable. People who went so far and at such an expense to make for themselves homes have taken the American idea of home with them, as everywhere the well-cultivated fields and comfortable farm-houses attest. At the start school-houses are erected, and church edifices and buildings for institutions of higher education soon appear. The Territory, as a whole, possesses a population that for moral worth, intellectual attainments, and all the requisites of good citizenship is not excelled anywhere.

Mr. President, there is another matter which I consider pertinent to this discussion, and of too much importance to be left entirely unnoticed on this occasion. It is something new in our political history. It is full of hope for the women of this country and of the world, and full of promise for the future of republican institutions. I refer to the fact that in Washington Territory the right of suffrage has been extended to women of proper age, and that the delegates to the constitutional convention to be held under the provisions of this bill, should it become a law, will, under existing laws of the Territory, be elected by its citizens without distinction as to sex, and the constitution to be submitted to the people will be passed upon in like manner.

I do not intend to discuss the question of woman suffrage upon this occasion, and I refer to it mainly for the purpose of directing attention to the advanced position which the people of this Territory have taken upon this question. I do not believe the proposition so often asserted that suffrage is a political privilege only, and not a natural right. It is regulated by the constitution and laws of a State I grant, but it needs no argument, it appears to me, to show that a constitution and laws adopted and enacted by a fragment of the whole body of the people, but binding alike on all, is a usurpation of the powers of government.

Government is but organized society. Whatever its form, it has its origin in the necessities of mankind and is indispensable for the maintenance of civilized society. It is essential to every government that it should represent the supreme power of the state and be capable of subjecting the will of its individual citizens to its authority. Such a government can only derive its just powers from the consent of the governed, and can be established only under a fundamental law which is self-imposed. Every citizen of suitable age and discretion who is to be subject to such a government, has in my judgment, a natural right to participate in its formation. It is a significant fact that should Congress pass this bill and authorize the people of Washington Territory to frame a State constitution and organize a State government, the fundamental law of the State will be made by all the citizens of the State to be subject to it, and not by one-half of them. And we shall witness the spectacle of a State government founded in accordance with the principles of equality, and have a State at last with a truly republican form of government.

The fathers of the Republic enunciated the doctrine "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." It is strange that any one in this enlightened age should be found to contend that this declaration is true only of men, and that a man is endowed by his Creator with inalienable rights not possessed by a woman. The lamented Lincoln immortalized the expression that ours is a Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," and yet it is far from that. There can be no government by the people where one-half of them are allowed no voice in its organization and control. I regard the struggle going on in this country and elsewhere for the enfranchisement of women as but a continuation of the great struggle for human liberty which has, from the earliest dawn of authentic history, convulsed nations, rent kingdoms, and drenched battlefields with human blood. I look upon the victories which have been achieved in the cause of woman's enfranchisement in Washington Territory and elsewhere as the crowing victories of all which have been won in the long-continued, still-continuing contest between liberty and oppression, and as destined to exert a greater influence upon the human race than any achieved upon the battlefield in ancient or modern times.

There is another matter in this connection to which I did not intend to allude, but which I think after it was mentioned yesterday by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] probably requires some further elaboration. I refer to the outrages in that Territory against the Chinese. Sir, if I believed that the people of Washington Territory as a whole were responsible for those outrages it would constitute an insuperable objection on my part to the admission of that Territory into the Union, but I do not. I do not stand here as an apologist for those transactions; I shall not defend here or elsewhere lawlessness and violence; I do not approve of any attempt by any community under any circumstances by unlawful means to redress real or supposed grievances.

This is a Government of laws, and if it is to accomplish the end for which all governments are organized, and to protect its citizens in life, liberty, and property, the laws must be obeyed and enforced. The outrages against the Chinese in Wyoming and Washington Territories and elsewhere upon the Pacific coast are inexcusable. It is the undoubted right of the people of every State and Territory to assemble in convention peaceably to petition the Government for redress of supposed grievances, to formulate their views in resolutions or otherwise, and to endeavor to impress them upon the community by proper means; but whenever individuals or a combination of individuals undertake to set aside the laws it is a grievous offense against good government, and ought to receive speedy and condign punishment.

But there are some mitigating circumstances which ought to be stated in connection with this matter in justice to the people of that Territory. As is well known, the people of the Pacific coast are almost unanimous in favor of the exclusion of Chinese from this country, and Congress has so far heeded their demand as to pass an act intended to prohibit the immigration of Chinese laborers into this country for a period of ten years. Washington Territory is so unfortunately situated geographically as to be the theater of frequent violations of that law. For a long distance from the northeast corner of the Territory to where the forty-ninth degree of north latitude intersects the main channel between Vancouver's Island and the main land, the division line between British Columbia and Washington Territory is marked by no natural boundary, and for the residue of the boundary down the Canal de Haro and the strait of Juan de Fuca the most insignificent vessel in the darkness of night in the space of a few hours can cross from the British Columbian side to the American side.

With sufficient appropriations and sufficient custom-house force it would be almost impossible to prevent the infraction of that law on the Washington Territory border, and with the appropriations which have been made and the present custom-house force it is utterly impossible to enforce the law. During the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad considerable numbers of Chinese were brought into the country as laborers in the construction of that road. As the road approached completion they were discharged and naturally found their way across the border into Washington Territory. They congregated at the principal towns, as Seattle and Tacoma, and greatly interfered with the occupations of white laborers there. A few indiscreet and, I believe, wicked individuals took advantage of the situation, and, by public speeches and otherwise, so excited the prejudice against the Chinese that in Seattle, Tacoma, New Castle, and perhaps some other places there were threats of violence against the Chinese, and in some cases actual violence used, which induced many of the Chinese to migrate to Oregon and California.

The Territorial militia not being armed and equipped so as to be available, the governor called for the intervention of Federal troops. They were sent to the scene of action, but as was said by the Senator from Connecticut yesterday, the people themselves took care of the matter, and when the Federal troops arrived on the ground they found the disturbance suppressed and order restored. The people who engaged in those proceedings were not the substantial people of the Territory; they were not citizens of the United States; they were foreigners mainly, many of them non-residents of the Territory. I hold in my hand a copy of The West Shore for March, 1886, a periodical published at Portland, Oreg., which contains a very intelligent and impartial article on this question, in which the character of those disturbers of the public peace is stated, and which, as I am not feeling very well, I shall pass up and have the Secretary read, as part of my remarks, what I have marked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

> The people of the Eastern States seem to think that violence and personal insecurity are features of life in what they are pleased to consider the "rowdy West." They apparently forget that the citizens of the Pacific coast are their own brothers, sons, and cousins, gifted by nature with equal abilities with themselves, inheriting the same love of justice, peace, and law, and possessing the same desire to see American institutions preserved and sustained. There is scarcely an individual in the East who has not some friends or relatives here, and by multiplying these by several hundred thousands he will have some idea of the character of our population. The youth of the country, the descendants of the pioneers, have enjoyed excellent educational advantages, and have become good and industrious citizens in as large a proportion as has the same class in Eastern communities. It is not the native but the imported element that has defied the law and been punished. The riotous elements of this region are the same that have within a few months bid defiance to the authorities of Saint Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, East Saginaw, and numerous other Eastern cities. They consist of those thriftless, hand-to-mouth, itinerant laborers, who, bound by no ties of family or property—and one might add "country"—roam from city to city and State to State, working a little here and a little there, never saving a cent, and consequently always discontented and ready to lend a willing ear to the voice of the demagogue "agitator," who easily persuades them that they have not received their just share of this world's goods. It is only of late years we have had many of this class among us. Numbers of them were employed by railroad contractors in the East and discharged here, while others have found their way here since the era of railroads, led by their general desire to "see the country," or by the reports of high wages paid in this region.

Mr. DOLPH. I said when the Federal troops reached the scene of the disturbance they found that order had been restored. In the cities where they occurred the best citizens, including the judges, lawyers, physicians, merchants, mechanics, and laboring men, volunteered, organized, and armed themselves for the purpose of putting down the disturbance and keeping the peace and preserving the good name of the Territory, demonstrating, as is suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, their ability to do that.

Under such circumstances, is there any one, I do not believe there is, who would seek to punish the people of the whole Territory for the act of a few irresponsible persons? If a territory is to be kept out of the Union because such things have happened there will be no more new States. If this rule had been applied to other Territories there never would have been a new State admitted into the Union. As was substantially said by the Senator from Connecticut yesterday, if States are to be punished for like offenses and deprived of self-government on that account, the Union would be speedily dissolved and this Chamber deserted.

To show how these disturbances are regarded by the substantial people of the Territory, I submit as part of my remarks resolutions that were adopted at a meeting of the King County bar, held at Seattle, Washington Territory, February 27, 1886. I will state that I have also an account of the meeting, from which it appears that there were some thirty members of the bar present, and these resolutions were adopted by a vote of 29 to 1, or, at least, with only one negative vote; and I judge from the report of the meeting that that negative vote was cast by a member of the bar who had participated in some of the meetings which instigated the troubles, and that one object of the meeting was to take into consideration whether he should not be stricken from the bar, which accounts for his vote. The resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions adopted at a meeting of the King County bar, held at Seattle, Wash. February 27, 1886.

Whereas a large number of evil-disposed persons congregated in the city of Seattle on the morning of Sunday, February 7, 1886, and sought by unlawful means and violence to expel the Chinese from the city, thereby violating the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States and the laws of the Territory; and

Whereas, from the number of roughs and strangers in the city on the 7th and 8th days of February, whom the oldest citizens had never seen in Seattle before, and from other conclusive proofs, it is evident that said unlawful movement and conspiracy was organized and set on foot by non-residents of this city, aided by a few resident professional agitators and idlers, who for months past have spent all their time in trying to embroil this community and promote needless strife therein, and who have succeeded by their inflammatory appeals, false logic, and malicious representations in misguiding and enlisting the sympathy of numerous persons who are otherwise disposed to be peaceable, law-abiding, and industrious citizens; and

Whereas at the command of the sheriff of this county and the governor of this Territory the militia and Home Guards turned out and protected the lives and rights of the Chinese and the lives and property of the citizens of this city; and

Whereas on the 8th day of February, while in the performance of their duty under the direction of the sheriff, the Home Guards were attacked by the mob, and in repulsing said attack several of the insurgents were wounded; and

Whereas the governor had on the 7th day of February issued his proclamation warning all persons to desist from breach of the peace, and commanding peaceably disposed persons to retire to their homes except such persons as were disposed to assist the sheriff and the duly constituted civil authorities in maintaining law and order, and requesting the latter to enroll themselves under the sheriff for that purpose; and

Whereas said proclamation was openly and violently disregarded by a large number of persons unlawfully and defiantly assembled together, and a state of actual insurrection existed against the duly constituted authorities, prostrating the courts and endangering the safety of society and the lives of the people; and

Whereas it is the duty of all law-abiding citizens to obey the commands of the sheriff when called upon by him, and the duty of all persons assembled with unlawful purpose to disperse and go to their homes when commanded so to do by the sheriff or the governor: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the bar of King County, That the unlawful assemblage of the mob in this city on said 7th and 8th days of February, the great majority of which mob, as we believe, was made up of lawless and disreputable characters from other places, was an unparalleled outrage upon the city of Seattle and its law-abiding citizens, and ought to meet the strongest condemnation of every honest, loyal man residing in it, and of every true American in the whole country.

Resolved, That in our opinion the exigencies of the occasion fully justified the declaration of martial law, and that the vigorous action of the authorities and the loyal citizens of Seattle merits and receives our warmest approval, and we hereby pledge them, one and all, our united and cordial support for all their acts in the premises.

Resolved, That the future prosperity of this county depends upon respect for and strict obedience to the law, and that every man who expects to share in that prosperity should do all in his power to aid in the maintenance and enforcement of the law in every capacity as a citizen, whether socially, in the jury-box, or when called upon to quell actual disturbance of the peace.

Resolved, That in a community like this, where there are no privileged classes and very little fixed capital, and where all are workers in some industry or calling, and where the prosperity of one class is intimately associated with the prosperity of all, there is no occasion for jealousy, animosity, or strife, and that those pestilent agitators who, abandoning every useful calling, have for months past, and at a time when Western Washington was to human view about entering upon an era of prosperity unprecendented in her history, devoted themselves to arraying one class against another by lies and incendiary appeals, are the worst enemies of society, and are especially the enemies of our honest workingmen, whom they are striving to dupe and trick into becoming law-breakers, and whose livelihood they already have imperiled by frightening capital out of the country, and by breaking up industries which have only been established after years of laborious exertion and sacrifice.

Resolved, That we call upon all the people of this county and this Territory to rebuke incendiary agitation, secret intrigue, and sedition, and to render a steadfast and loyal support to a Government that has showered greater blessings upon mankind than any other, and one whose liberal form can only be maintained and its blessings perpetuated by the virtue, intelligence, vigilance and active loyalty of its people.

J. R. LEWIS, Chairman.
CHARLES F. MUNDAY, Secretary.

[At this point the honorable Senator yielded the floor to enable the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business.]

Mr. MANDERSON. As I understand that the Senator from Oregon desires to conclude his remarks to-morrow, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon yields to the Senator from Nebraska, who moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 31, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REDUCTIONS AND EXEMPTIONS OF TONNAGE DUES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In further answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th of February last, calling upon the Secretary of State for copies of all correspondence relating to the claims of governments to be accorded the reductions and exemptions of tonnage dues accorded to vessels entering the ports of the United States from certain ports named in the shipping act of June 26, 1884, I transmit herewith a copy of the reply of the Attorney-General to the letter of the Secretary of State of December 15, 1885, as found on pages 35 and 36 of Executive Document No. 132, House of Representatives, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, communicated on the 22d instant.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 30, 1886.

SALARIES, BOARD OF PENSION APPEALS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending that the salaries of members of the board of pension appeals be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

JAMES TUCKER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order and findings of fact by that court in the case of James Tucker against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

MARY A. BLACKWELL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order and findings of fact by that court in the case of Mary A. Blackwell against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also, in accordance with the rule, laid before the House the bill (S. 1487) to establish two additional land districts in the State of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. GLOVER to withdraw House bill No. 7081; also to Mr. DAVENPORT to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Mrs. Clara G. Scott, without leaving certified copies on file.

ANN B. HUBBARD.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of House bill No. 409 for the relief of Ann B. Hubbard, administratrix, and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to Ann B. Hubbard, as administratrix of the estate of Edward Hubbard, deceased, the sum of $366.41, in full compensation for his services in transporting the mails of the United States between the post-offices at Wiscasset and Sheepscott Bridge, in the State of Maine, from December 8, A. D. 1871, to the 11th day of February, A. D. 1873.

There being no objection to the consideration of the bill, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS P. WESTMORELAND.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6663 and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Thomas P. Westmoreland, of Atlanta, Ga., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500, the same to be in payment and satisfaction for his services as prosecuting attorney for the people of the United States against Robert Bolton, W. B. Freeland, Charles Miller, and James F. Self, for murder, in the courts of the United States, under and pursuant to the order of the circuit judge of the United States court in the northern district of Georgia.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask unanimous consent that the report in this case may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report (by Mr. LANHAM) is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Thomas P. Westmoreland, of Georgia, having investigated the same, herewith report a bill for the relief of said Westmoreland, and recommend its passage.

For a statement of the facts in the matter referenee is here made to the subjoined report from the Committee on Claims at the last Congress:

[House Report No. 2646, Forty-eighth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition and accompanying papers of Thomas P. Westmoreland, of Atlanta, Ga., submit the following report:

In 1881 Robert Bolton, W. B. Freeland, Charles Miller, and James F. Self were connected with the United States revenue department in Georgia, and searching for illicit distillers in Gwinnett County, Georgia. They tried to arrest J. J.

Hicks and killed him. A warrant charging them with murder was issued by a State justice of the peace, of Gwinnett County, and they were arrested thereon by the sheriff of Fulton County, Georgia. They applied to the United States court for habeas corpus cum causa, to remove their cause to that court, upon the allegation that the killing of Hicks occurred in the execution of their duty as United States officers. By the United States statutes, for such cases provided, the United States district attorney is required to defend prisoners under such circumstances. As there was no person required or authorized to prosecute them in the United States court, Judge Pardee, the United States circuit judge, then and there presiding (as Mr. Westmoreland had represented the sheriff in his opposition to delivering up his prisoners), appointed him special attorney to prosecute said parties.

Pursuant to said order Mr. Westmoreland had the prisoners carried before the committing court, spent two or three days investigating the case, and at the next term of Gwinnett superior court had them indicted for murder, and an order for the removal and transmission of the copy record to the United States court was made. In that court the cases were tried in 1883, Judge H. K. McCoy presiding. The trial lasted several days; Judge Bigby, the United States district attorney, defending, and Mr. Westmoreland prosecuting. The result was a verdict of not guilty. The preparation of the cases required much time, and we think the services of Mr. Westmoreland were worth $500. As the general law provided no way of paying for such services, we report a bill for paying him that sum.

We hereto attach the account and certificates accompanying the petition:

The State of Georgia vs. Robert Bolton, W. B. Freeland, Charles Miller, and James T. Self. Murder. In circuit court of United States from Gwinnett County, Georgia.

United States of America to T. P. Westmoreland, Dr.:

To services in the prosecution of Robert Bolton, W. B. Freeland, Charles Miller, and James T. Self, before the committing court; also before the grand jury of Gwinnett County, Georgia, 40 miles from Atlanta, Ga.; also on the final trial before the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Georgia, by appointment of their honors Don A. Pardee and H. K. McCoy, judges of said court..... $500

See copy of orders hereto attached.

This claim is just and the charges reasonable, and I certify that I have applied to the Department of Justice for its payment, and payment denied on the ground of want of legal authority to pay it.

THOMAS P. WESTMORELAND.

ATLANTA, GA., January 14, 1884.

State of Georgia vs. R. D. Bolton, W. B. Freeland, C. A. Miller.

Ordered by the court that Thomas P. Westmoreland, esq., be appointed special attorney to represent the Government in the prosecution of this case before the United States commissioner who may be designated to hold the court of inquiry, and before the grand jury, and before the petit jury finally trying any indictment found in this case. That said attorney and the solicitor-general of Gwinnett County are authorized to lay this case before the next grand jury impaneled for Gwinnett County, who may find an indictment if the evidence warrants, which indictment shall be removed into this court for trial, subject to such exceptions as may be legally taken against it.

In open court, March 22, 1882.

DON A. PARDEE, United States Judge.

State of Georgia vs. Robert Bolton, James T. Self.

Thomas P. Westmoreland, having been appointed by the presiding judge to prosecute the above-named persons in the circuit court of the United States, and said order not having been put on the minutes of the court, it is ordered that said appointment be confirmed, and that this order be put on the minutes of the circuit court.

October 7, 1882.

M. K. McCOY, United States Judge.

CLERK'S OFFICE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT,
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA,
January —, 1884.

I, R. E. Boyd, deputy clerk United States district court, northern district of Georgia, do hereby certify that the foregoing are correct copies of orders which appear on the minutes of said court. I further certify that the minutes show that the cases of The State of Georgia vs. Robert Bolton, W. B. Freeland, Charles Miller, and James T. Self, murder, from Gwinnett County, Georgia, have been tried in the circuit court of the United States for northern district of Georgia, and finally disposed of by a verdict of "not guilty."

Given under my hand and seal of office this January 11, 1884.

ATLANTA, GA., January 11, 1884.

I hereby certify that the cases of The State of Georgia against Robert Bolton, W. B. Freeland, Charles Miller, and James T. Self, murder, from Gwinnett County, Georgia, have been tried in the circuit court of the United States, northern district of Georgia, and finally disposed of by a verdict of "not guilty," and that Thomas P. Westmoreland, esq., represented the Government of the United States in the prosecution of said cases by appointment of the presiding judge of said court. Said cases were tried before me, and occupied the court three days.

January 11, 1884.

HENRY K. McCOY, United States Judge.

Mr. HAMMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN F. SLATER.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar House joint resolution No. 115, and put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John F. Slater.

Resolved, That the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the cost of the medal ordered by public resolution numbered 6, approved February 6, 1888, to be presented to John F. Slater, of Connecticut, then living, but lately deceased.

SEC. 2. That said medal and a copy of the original resolution aforesaid shall be presented to the legal representatives of said John F. Slater, deceased.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. Has this had the consideration of a committee of the House?

Mr. WAIT. It is unanimously reported from the Committee on the Library.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY THROUGH INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PERKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7478) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES M. LOWRY.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 277) for the relief of James M. Lowry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $217.73 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James M. Lowry, of Whitfield County, Georgia, the same being balance due him for services rendered as assistant marshal in the eleventh enumerator's district of East Tennessee in taking the eighth census of the United States.

SEC. 2. That all laws militating against this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Is this a payment for taking the last census?

Mr. CLEMENTS. It is a payment for taking the eighth census.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What is the reason this payment was not made before?

Mr. CLEMENTS. I will ask for the reading of the report, which explains the matter clearly.

The SPEAKER. The report is in the nature of debate. But if there be no objection it can be read, the right to object to the consideration of the bill being reserved.

The report (by Mr. NEAL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 277) for the relief of James M. Lowry, submit the following report:

It appears that claimant was assistant marshal at the eighth census for the eleventh enumeration district of East Tennessee, and that a balance is still due him for his services. The amount due, and the reasons why the same has not been paid, are stated in the letter following from the Census Office:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 28, 1883.

SIR: Responding to your verbal request relative to the claim of Mr. James M. Lowry as an assistant marshal at the eighth census for the eleventh enumerator's district of East Tennessee, I beg to inform you that it does not appear from the records of this office that Mr. Lowry has yet received final payment for his services in that capacity.

The full sum allowed him as an assistant marshal at the eighth census was $430.77, of which he received on first payment $213.

The late war and consequent disabilities prevented any final payment in this case, as in many others, but in 1879 an estimate of the amount required to pay all outstanding balances to marshals and assistant marshals at the eighth census who had not been paid in full was made by this office, and an appropriation therefor was made by Congress (under act of June 20, 1879).

Included in the amount estimated for by this office was the sum of $217.73 for final pay to Mr. James M. Lowry, but it does not appear from our records that he was ever paid.

The appropriation therefore has, however, long since lapsed, and before payment can be made to Mr. Lowry further action by Congress must be had.

Mr. Lowry's letter to yourself is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

C. W. SEATON,
Superintendent of Census.

A true copy.

GEO. M. LOCKWOOD,
Chief Clerk Interior Department.

Hon. J. C. CLEMENTS, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

Claimant further shows that after the appropriation of June 20, 1879, referred to in the foregoing letter, he was not informed of the same, and consequently was not paid until this appropriation had lapsed. It is manifestly just in the opinion of your committee that this bill should be passed, and they so recommend.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether all similar claims from the South were paid in 1879?

Mr. CLEMENTS. They were, in accordance with estimates made at that time.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And an appropriation was made by Congress?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to state that I examined this claim during the last Congress and found it just. It was before the committee of which I was chairman, and in that capacity I examined it. Such claims have hitherto been paid, and this ought to be.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not want to interfere with anything that provides equality in matters of this sort. At the same time I do not want to open these questions again.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri rises to present a report which the Chair understands is privileged under an order of the House made a few days ago.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, from the Committee on Labor, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 7313, a bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés; which was read a first and second time.

House bill No. 7313 was laid on the table.

The report of the Committee on Labor was read, as follows:

The Committee on Labor, to which was referred bill H. R. 7313, creating boards of arbitration for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial commerce or business and their employés, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report back the accompanying bill as a substitute therefor, and recommend that the said bill lie upon the table, and that the substitute do pass.

The substitute (H. R. 7479) was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever differences or controversies arise between common carriers engaged in the transportation of property or passengers, whether said common carriers be private persons or corporations, between two or more States of the United States, or within the Territories of the United States, or within the District of Columbia, and the employés of said common carriers, which differences or controversies may hinder, impede, obstruct, interrupt, or affect such transportation of property or passengers, or when such employés, or any of them, allege that he or they have been treated unjustly or oppressively, either as to wages, hours of labor, or otherwise, by such common carrier, if, upon the written proposition of either party to the controversy to submit their differences to arbitration, the other party shall accept the proposition, then and in such event the common carrier is hereby authorized to select and appoint one person, and such employé or employés, as the case may be, to select and appoint another person, and the two persons thus selected and appointed to select a third person, all three of whom shall be citizens of the United States and wholly impartial and disinterested in respect to such differences or controversies: and the three persons thus selected and appointed shall be, and they are hereby, created and constituted a board of arbitration, with the duties, powers, and privileges hereinafter set forth.

SEC. 2. That the board of arbitration provided for in the first section of this act shall possess all the powers and authority in respect to administering oaths, subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance, preserving order during the sittings of the board, punishing for contempt, and requiring the production of papers and writings, and all other powers and privileges, in their nature applicable, now possessed and belonging to United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States; and said board of arbitartion may appoint a clerk and employ a stenographer, and prescribe all reasonable rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions and purposes of this act, looking to the speedy advancement of the differences and controversies submitted to them to a conclusion and determination. Each of said arbitrators shall take an oath to honesty, fairly, and faithfully perform his duties, and that he is not personally interested in the subject-matter in controversy, which oath may be administered by any State or Territorial officer authorized to administer oaths. The third person so selected and appointed as aforesaid shall be the president of said board; and any order, finding, conclusion, or award made by a majority of such arbitrators shall be of the same force and effect as if all three of such arbitrators concurred therein or united in making the same.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said board of arbitration, immediately upon their selection, to organize at the nearest practicable point to the place of the origin of the difficulty or controversy, and to hear and determine the matters of difference which may be submitted to them in writing by all the parties, giving them full opportunity to be heard on oath, in person and by witnesses, and also granting them the right to be represented by counsel; and after concluding its investigation said board shall publicly announce its award, which, with the findings of fact upon which it is based, shall be reduced to writing and signed by the arbitrators concurring therein, and, together with the testimony taken in the case, shall be filed with the Commissioner of Labor of the United States, who shall make such award public as soon as the same shall have been received by him.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the right of any employés engaged in the controversy to appoint, by designation in writing, one or more persons to act for them in the selection of an arbitrator to represent them upon the board of arbitration.

SEC. 5. That each member of said tribunal of arbitration, and the clerk, stenographer, and witnesses attending before them, shall be entitled to receive like fees or compensation as United States commissioners, and clerks, stenographers, and witnesses attending before United States commissioners; and such fees or compensation shall be payable by the United States in like manner as fees of such United States commissioners, and witnesses before such United States commissioners, in criminal causes, are payable under existing laws.

Mr. DUNN. I make the point of order that that bill must go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that the bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill.

Mr. COX. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Does this bill take precedence of the unfinished business of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The bill has preference over everything else, if insisted on. An order of the House was made by unanimous consent to give that committee leave to report at any time a bill on this subject.

Mr. BAYNE. But the morning hour will come after the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. This does not interfere with the morning hour after the consideration of this bill is concluded.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, there were—ayes 101, noes 5.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair), and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, so that we may proceed at once to general debate.

Mr. GLOVER and Mr. REED, of Maine, objected.

The bill was again read.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish to inquire whether it would be proper at this time to have read a substitute which I propose to offer for this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] has the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask the gentleman from Missouri if he will allow me to have my substitute read at this time?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Not now. I think it better that some explanation should, in the first place, be given as to the provisions of the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Labor have had before it the subject of arbitration, or of endeavoring to provide some means of settling disputes between labor and capital, almost since its formation. During the past two months every avenue has been drained where we could reasonably hope to secure information as to some feasible method consistent with the Constitution of this country and our laws that would provide a mode of settlement of these disastrous disputes. We have intended if possible to provide a system, where it did not conflict with State rights or State laws—a tribunal to which both parties should go to have the differences between labor and capital adjusted.

Every phase of this question has been gone over thoroughly; the feature of voluntary arbitration and the feature of compulsory or statutory arbitration have been fully considered, and so far as regards the application of those principles to the question of determining disputes between employés of railroad companies and those companies, our committee have decided that this is the best we can do. This bill provides for an arbitration; in each dispute each side selecting a disinterested person, those two selecting a third, and the three arbitrators are sworn to faithfully and impartially determine the questions at issue; they are created a court, with full powers to send for persons and papers, examine witnesses under oath to obtain the fullest information and announce their verdict, trusting to the power of public opinion for the enforcement of the award. We have been unable to discover any means of dealing with these questions by law at present, except providing, as this bill provides, for an honest tribunal, where workmen can go without expense and ask for justice from the corporations that employ them.

I know that this bill will be disappointing to many members of this House. I know that there are many members here who feel that this is not what they expected. But if they will only reflect on the subject they will realize that the first thing to consider in the settlement of differences between organized workingmen and these great corporations is, how far can you regulate these disputes by law, and how much can be accomplished by an appeal to public opinion? If this method fails, then there is but one other, and that is that with the strong arm of the Government we take these giant corporations by the throat and tell them that they must yield to arbitration; must submit the differences between them and their employés to some peaceful method of settlement; that we can not have a continuance of the condition of affairs that prevails to-day through five States of this Union—practically a revolution, all business suspended, the people of great cities suffering from the increase in the price of food and fuel from inability to obtain supplies, also resulting in thousands of men being thrown out of employment from the same cause.

I do not pretend to say who is to blame. I only know that the workmen along the line of that road where the trouble is have stated that they are willing to arbitrate their grievances, and I know that the president of that vast corporation has not yet consented to do it. In the mean time, thank Heaven, the sober second-thought of the intelligent workingmen has kept their strike within bounds, and I have such faith in their intelligence and manhood that I am convinced they will prevent any more disastrous consequences until the termination of this trouble. We have studied the subject earnestly and faithfully, and the committee, by the unanimous vote of those present, are of the opinion that this bill contains all that we can do at this time. We feel that all we can do at this stage is to invoke the public opinion of the country in the existing dispute, as in all others of like character, to compel the parties on both sides to appeal to reason, and to say that brute force shall not and need not be used to obtain human rights. I hope, Mr. Chairman, for the moral effect which will result from the prompt action of the House upon this measure, that no needless time will be consumed in discussing this subject.

I reserve the remainder of my time, and I now yield the floor.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], who is a member of the committee reporting this bill, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I resume the floor, Mr. Chairman, to hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. BURROWS. What provision is there in this bill for enforcing the award of the arbitrators?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. There is none but the effect of public opinion. That is all.

Mr. BURROWS. Another question: Suppose one of the parties should refuse to accept the offer of arbitration?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You have only the same result as before.

Mr. BURROWS. This seems to be an entirely harmless bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Well, Mr. Chairman, I believe that public opinion has accomplished the grandest reforms on earth. It has done more for human freedom than all your appeals to brute force.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to ask him a question. In the second section of the bill these arbitrators are given certain powers and privileges, and then "all other powers and privileges, in their nature applicable, now possessed and belonging to the United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States"——

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. I desire to give notice that at the proper time I will propose a substitute for this bill. I send it to the desk now and ask that it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The question I want to ask is, whether the chairman or the members of the committee reporting this bill have sufficiently examined the question to be able to tell us what are the powers and privileges possessed and belonging to United States commissioners that are applicable to such an arbitration as this bill proposes?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The power of sending for persons and papers and examining witnesses under oath.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. These United States commissioners have a great many powers that are given to them by statute——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The powers are stated in this bill itself, "administering oaths, subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance, preserving order during the sittings of the board, punishing for contempt, and requiring the production of papers and writings."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. "And all other powers and privileges." What are the other powers?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. All other powers "in their nature applicable.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What are they?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is according to what transpires in the progress of the arbitration.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that I shall vote for this bill; and as that is my purpose I want to say in advance to the workingmen of the country that it is a trick upon their credulity and a fraud.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will pardon the Chair for interposing. The Chair supposed the gentleman from Pennsylvania desired to submit a question to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman said that he yielded to me.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Only for a question.

Mr. KELLEY. Only for a question. Very well. Then I ask the gentleman whether any workingman who believes that this bill is a measure to provide for speedy settlement of controversies and differences, as its title says, will not be deceived? There can not be any adjudication——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. What is the question?

Mr. KELLEY. Can there be adjudication under this bill between Jay Gould and the strikers on his road so long as Jay Gould does not assent thereto?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why, Mr. Chairman, I stated that matter fully. I can only answer by saying that in the works of Livingstone, which the gentleman has evidently read, that great traveler states that in the most benighted regions of Africa he could find people most intensely critical in regard to every character of mechanism who could not produce the simplest machine themselves. The gentleman is the "Father of the House." Why does not he propose something instead of simply tearing down?

Mr. KELLEY. I am not a member of the committee——

Mr. O'NEILL. When we had under consideration here the bill for prohibiting the importation of contract labor the gentleman made the identical speech—pronounced the measure "buncombe" and said it would not work.

Mr. KELLEY. I will vote for any bill for the relief of oppressed labor; but I will not vote for this mass of words unless my vote be accompanied with this notice that the bill means nothing.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether he will not at this time allow to be read a substitute which I shall propose for the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We considered your substitute.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. This is a different substitute.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You can offer it in your own time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] yields to me for a question. My question is whether he is not surprised, after hearing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] declare that he would vote for this bill, to hear him further declare it to be a trick on the credulity of the workingmen and a fraud?

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas rises, as the Chair understands, to a question of order. The Chair will suspend proceedings until order is restored in the Hall.

Mr. BRUMM (after a pause). I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether it is intended that we shall vote on this bill to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is the intention of the committee to reach a vote to-day, if possible.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask whether I was not recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that the uniform practice observed heretofore is to recognize first members of the committee who have reported the bill. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], who is second on the committee, and he has yielded a part of his time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. I desire to give notice that at the proper time I will offer as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee the measure which I hold in my hand and which I ask may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read as part of the gentleman's remarks and in his time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever a dispute shall arise between any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property or passengers by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, and the employés of such person or persons, or any of them, and when the said employer or employés can not agree in respect thereof, it shall be lawful for the employer and employé, or either of them, to demand and have an arbitration or reference thereof in manner following, that is to say: Where the party complained of and the party complaining shall come before or agree, by any writing under their hands, to abide by the determination of any judge of any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of whose court the parties, or either of them, reside, it shall and may be lawful for such judge to hear and finally determine in a summary manner the matter in dispute between such parties; but if such parties shall not come before or so agree to abide by the determination of such judge, then it shall be lawful for any such judge, and such judge is hereby required, on complaint made before him, and the submission of the name of an arbitrator to act for complainant, and proof, by the examination of the party making such complaint, that application has been made to the person or persons against whom such cause of complaint has arisen (or his or their agent if such dispute has arisen with such agent or agents) to settle such dispute, and that the same has not been settled, to summon before him such person or persons or agent or agents complained of, on some day, not exceeding three days, exclusive of Sunday, after the making of such complaint, giving notice to the person making such complaint of the time and place appointed in such summons for the attendance of such person or persons, agent or agents, as aforesaid, requiring such person or persons complained of to appear and do away with such cause of complaint or name an arbitrator to settle such dispute; and if at such time and place the person or persons complained of shall not appear and do away with such cause of complaint or name an arbitrator to settle such dispute, the judge shall issue a certificate of appointment to the arbitrator named by complainant (which may have the form hereinafter provided); and it shall be lawful for the said arbitrator, at such time and place, to proceed by himself to the hearing and determination of the said matters in dispute; and in such case the award of such sole arbitrator shall be final and conclusive as to all matters in dispute submitted to such arbitrator, without being subject to appeal, review, or suspension: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall authorize any judge or arbitrators acting as herein mentioned to establish a rate of wages or price of labor or workmanship at which the employé shall in future be paid, nor to fix the hours of labor for the future, without the mutual consent of both employer and employé.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of this act the term "employer" shall be construed to mean any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property or passengers by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more States or Territories of the United States or to or from any foreign country; and the term "employé" shall be construed to mean any person under hire or salary to said employer as above defined, and doing manual labor therefor, as well as all combinations and associations of such persons, known as trades unions and labor associations, and other associations for like purposes, whether incorporated or unincorporated, which associations shall have the like power to avail themselves of the provisions of this act as if they were individuals.

SEC. 3. That for the purposes of this act a claim for wages due any employé, which has been demanded and not paid, shall be construed to be a dispute in the sense that term is used in the first section of this act, and the benefits of this act shall be available to the claimant.

SEC. 4. That if the person or persons complained of shall name an arbitrator at the time and place appointed, the judge shall issue a certificate of appointment, and an order to the two arbitrators (which may be in the form hereinafter provided) directing them to meet at a certain time and place upon the next day (Sundays excepted), and name a person upon whom they shall both agree to act as a third arbitrator in settling the matter in dispute; and the third arbitrator shall, when so named and his acceptance in writing filed in said court, receive a certificate of appointment (which may be in form as hereinafter provided), and the said three arbitrators shall thereupon proceed to the immediate consideration and settlement of the disputes as hereinafter provided, and the decision of a majority shall determine it.

SEC. 5. That should the said two first-named arbitrators fail or refuse at the time and place appointed to name a third arbitrator as aforesaid, the said judge shall name the third arbitrator, who shall be the labor commissioner (or one of the commissioners if there shall be more than one) of the State wherein the proceedings are had, if there be one, and he signify within twelve hours his willingness to act, and if not, some person as nearly as possible impartial and indifferent between the two parties, and whose nomination shall not be subject to impeachment or review: Provided, That no arbitrator shall be appointed by the said judge until he has filed in court his written acceptance of the nomination.

SEC. 6. That in case any arbitrator refuses to act, the judge may, in his discretion, remove him, or compel, by process of contempt, the due discharge of his duties; and in case of removal, death, or disability of an arbitrator the judge shall order the selection of another in lieu thereof, in the same manner in which the original selection was made; and should he be of the opinion that either party has been prejudiced thereby, he may, in his discretion, order the proceedings to be begun de novo; and in every case of a second nomination the arbitrators shall meet within twelve hours thereafter, and at the same place at which the meeting of the referees first named was appointed, or at some other convenient place as the judge may appoint; and the expense of every such application for the appointment of a second arbitrator shall be borne and defrayed by the party through whose default, or the default of whose arbitrator such application is rendered necessary; and the judge making such second appointment shall certify the same in the form for that purpose hereafter set forth, or in some other form to the like effect; and in every case where a second arbitrator shall be appointed as aforesaid, and such second arbitrator shall not attend at the time and place appointed for settling the matters in dispute, it shall be lawful for the other arbitrator or arbitrators, at such time and place, to proceed to the hearing and determining of the same matters in dispute; and in such case the award of such arbitrators shall be final and conclusive as to all matters in dispute submitted to such arbitrators, without being subject to review, appeal, or suspension.

SEC. 7. That the three arbitrators or referees being so nominated as aforesaid, the said judge shall thereupon appoint a place of meeting according to the directions of this act, and also a day for the meeting, notice of which nomination and of the day of meeting shall thereupon be given by such judge to the persons so nominated arbitrators or referees, and to any party to any such dispute who may not have attended the meeting before said judge as aforesaid; which appointment shall be by such judge certified in the form following, or in some other form to the like effect, that is to say:

"I, A B, judge of the United States district court for the district of ——, do hereby certify that C and D and E are duly nominated arbitrators to settle the matters in difference between G H, of ——, employer [or agent or foreman, as the case may be], and I J, of ——, employé [or otherwise, as the case may be], pursuant to an act entitled [title of this act], and that the said arbitrators are hereby directed to meet at —— on ——, the —— day of ——, at —— o'clock in the forenoon [or afternoon, as the case may be].

"—— ——, A B."

"I, A B, judge of the United States district court for the —— district of ——, hereby certify that the above-named C and D and E [or one of them, as the case may be] having refused or delayed to act in the above-mentioned reference, L M and N O and P Q [or L M only, as the case may be] are [or is] by me duly nominated arbitrator [or arbitrators], together with the above-named C D [or E F], to settle the matters in difference between the above-named G H and I J; and the said C D or E F, together with the said L M [or the said L M or N O or P Q, as the case may be], are directed to meet at the place above mentioned on ——, the —— day of ——, in the year of our Lord ——, at —— o'clock in the forenoon [or afternoon as the case may be]."

And the persons so appointed as aforesaid shall hear and examine the parties and their witnesses, and determine such dispute within two days after such nomination, exclusive of Sundays; and the determination of such arbitrators shall be final and conclusive.

SEC. 8. That in all cases where complaints are made by employés the place of meeting of the arbitrators shall be at or as near as may be to the place where the work shall be carrying on.

SEC. 9. That if any person so complaining as aforesaid shall not attend, or send some person on his or her behalf, at the time and place appointed by such judge for the purpose of naming such persons aforesaid, such person shall not in such case be entitled to the benefit of this act.

SEC. 10. That the said arbitrators shall meet at the time and place fixed by the judge by whom such arbitrators were appointed, and shall, by inspection of the work in regard to which the dispute may have arisen, by hearing and examining the parties, or any other persons on their behalf, or that attend to give evidence respecting the matters in dispute upon oath (which the said arbitrators are hereby empowered to administer), or otherwise, or by otherwise ascertaining the true state of the case in such manner as to such arbitrators shall appear necessary, proceed to determine the matter or matters in dispute referred to them; and the award to be made by such arbitrators shall be final and conclusive between the parties, without being subject to review or challenge by any court or authority whatsoever.

SEC. 11. That it shall be lawful for any arbitrator or arbitrators, and he and they are hereby authorized and required, at the request in writing of any of the parties, to issue his or their summons to any witness or witnesses to appear and give evidence before such arbitrator or arbitrators, at the time and place appointed for hearing and determining any such dispute, and which time and place shall be specified in such summons; and if any person so summoned to appear as a witness as aforesaid shall not appear before such arbitrator or arbitrators touching the matter of such dispute, then and in every such case it shall be lawful for said judge, and he is hereby authorized (proof on oath, in the case of any person not appearing according to such summons, having been first made before such judge of the due service of such summons on every such person, by delivering the same to him, or by leaving the same, twenty-four hours before the time appointed for such person to appear before such arbitrator or arbitrators, at the usual place of abode of such person), by warrant under the hands of any such judge, to commit any such person so making default in appearing, or appearing and refusing to give evidence, to some prison within the jurisdiction of any such judge, there to remain, without bail, until such person shall submit himself to be examined and give his evidence before such arbitrator or arbitrators as aforesaid: Provided always, That in case such dispute shall be heard and determined before such offender shall submit to be examined and give evidence as aforessid, then, and in every such case, he, she, or they shall be imprisoned the full term of three months.

SEC. 12. That in case such arbitrators so appointed shall not make and sign their award within three days after the date of the order of such judge certifying their appointment, then any party in interest, or any arbitrator, may, without delay, go before the judge by whom the arbitrators were appointed, and in case of his absence or indisposition, before any other judge of the district or circuit court of the United States residing nearest to the place where the meeting to settle such dispute shall have taken place, and shall advise him thereof; and thereupon the said judge shall cite the said arbitrators before him, and order them to make and sign an award, within some time not exceeding three days, and enforce the said order, if necessary, by process for contempt.

SEC. 13. That as well in all such cases of dispute as aforesaid as in all other cases, if the parties mutually agree that the matter in dispute shall be arbitrated and determined in a different mode to the one hereby prescribed, such agreement shall be valid, and the award and determination thereon final and conclusive between the parties; and the same proceedings of execution, sale, and imprisonment, &c., as hereafter mentioned, shall be had toward enforcing such award as are by this act prescribed for enforcing awards made under and by virtue of its provisions.

SEC. 14. That it shall be lawful in all cases for any employer or employé, by writing under his hand, acknowledged as in the case of deeds, to authorize any person to act for him in submitting to arbitration and attending arbitrators or judges touching the matter of any arbitrations.

SEC. 15. That in all cases where any proceedings may be had against an employer under this act, or where such proceedings shall have been commenced, and the employer or employers shall become or be bankrupt, or any assignment of his or their estate or effects shall have been made under the said bankruptcy, or otherwise by deed or in law, the factor or trustees upon, or the assignee or assignees of such estate or effects, or the receiver thereof, shall be liable to the proceedings authorized by this act against the employer as fully as the employer was or were before the bankruptcy or assignment; and such proceedings may be commenced or carried on against such factor, trustee, assignee or assignees, or receiver, who shall fulfill and abide by the award made thereupon, and all such order or orders as shall be made by the said judge in or respecting the matters in dispute, and shall be subject to the same proceedings and consequences for willfully refusing or delaying to abide by or perform the same as if the proceedings had been had against the employer or employers before his or their bankruptcy, or the assignment of his or their estate or effects: Provided, That all sums of money to be paid in pursuance of such award or orders shall be recoverable only out of the estate or effects of such employer, and not out of the proper money of such factor, trustee, assignee or assignees, or receiver.

SEC. 16. That where any married woman, or infant under the age of twenty-one years, shall have cause of complaint, in any of the cases provided for by this act, against any employer or employers, his or their agent or servant, or factor, or trustee, or assignee or assignees, as aforesaid, such complaint may be lodged and all further proceedings thereupon had by and in the name of the husband of such married woman, and of the father, or, if dead, of the mother, or, if on the death of both parents, of any of the kindred of such infant, or of the guardian of any such infant, or of any person nominated by such infant if he or she shall not have parent, kindred, or guardian; and all such proceedings shall be as effectual, valid, and binding as if such married woman was sole and such infants were of full age, and pursued by themselves the remedies provided by this act.

SEC. 17. That if the parties by and between whom the said arbitration shall take place as aforesaid shall think it expedient or be desirous to extend the time hereby limited for the making the award, it shall and may be lawful for them, with the leave of said judge, to extend the same accordingly by indorsement, according to the form in the schedule hereunto annexed, on the back of the order of the judge certifying the appointment of the arbitrators, to be signed by both of them in the presence of one or more credible witness or witnesses.

SEC. 18. That the award or umpirage to be made upon any arbitration demanded under this act shall and may be drawn up and written at the foot or upon the back of the said order certifying the appointment of the arbitrators, according to the form in the schedule hereunto annexed; which, with the award, shall thereupon be recorded in the United States district court, and have all the force and effect of a judgment thereof and be executed in the same manner; and the said award may be in any form and provide any remedy which may be deemed best fitted to provide a final and effective settlement of the controversy.

SEC. 19. That if any party shall refuse or delay to fulfill an award under this act for the space or term of two days after the same shall have been recorded as aforesaid, any such judge shall, on the application of the party aggrieved, and he is hereby required, by warrant under his hand according to the form of the schedule hereunto annexed, or in some other form to the like effect, to cause the sum or sums of money directed to be paid by any such award to be levied by execution and sale of any goods and chattels of the person or persons liable to pay the same, together with all costs and charges attending such execution and sale, such sale to take place within such time, not exceeding five days, as the said judge shall think proper, and the overplus, if any, to arise by such sale, to be rendered to the owners of the goods and chattels levied on; and in a case for a mandamus or injunction, the court may issue the same, and punish disobedience thereof by proceedings for contempt in the usual form.

SEC. 20. That where any person shall be committed to prison for refusing or delaying to fulfill an award as aforesaid, and such person shall, at any time during the period of his or her imprisonment, pay to the governor or keeper of the prison the full amount of the sum awarded, with all reasonable expenses incurred through such refusal or delay, he is hereby required forthwith to discharge such person from his custody.

SEC. 21. That the judge by whom any person or persons shall be committed to prison for not appearing as a witness, or not submitting to be examined, shall cause the warrant or order for such commitment to be drawn up in the form or to the effect set forth in the schedule to this act.

SEC. 22. That no appeal or certiorari shall lie against any proceedings under this act.

SEC. 23. That no proceedings under this act shall be invalid for want of form.

SEC. 24. That half the usual, and no higher, fees shall be allowed to be taken for any proceeding under this act; and where no fees are fixed by law they shall be fixed by the judge; and a table of fees, signed by the clerk of such district court, shall be hung up in every place where any session of the district court shall be held.

SEC. 25. That all costs attending the application to the judge of said district court to be made under this act, and of the arbitration pursuant thereon, shall be settled by the arbitrator or arbitrators by whom such disputes shall be settled; and where the same shall be determined by any judge, pursuant to this act, then the costs aforesaid shall be settled by such judge: Provided always, That no employer, his foreman or agent, shall in any case be allowed for costs by the said judge or arbitrator, unless it shall appear to him or them that the proceedings of the employé were vexatious and oppressive.

SEC. 26. That no action shall be brought against any arbitrator, marshal, or other officer, or against any other person or persons whomsoever, for any matter or thing whatsoever done or committed under or by virtue or in the execution of this act, unless such action shall be brought within six calendar months next after the doing or committing of such matter or thing.

SEC. 27. That if any action or suit shall be hereafter commenced or prosecuted against any person or persons for anything done under, by virtue, or in the execution of this act, such person or persons may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if the plaintiff shall become non-suited or suffer discontinuance, or forbear further prosecution, or if judgment shall be given for the defendant or defendants, such defendant or defendants shall recover his, her, or their full costs, and for which he, she, or they shall have like remedy as in cases where costs by law are given to defendants.

SEC. 28. That it shall not be lawful for any employer, as defined in this act, to issue any scrip, bond, debenture, or promise to pay, for the purpose of paying employés, or to use the same for such purpose; and the employer, his or their officer or agent, who violates this provision of this act, shall be punished for each infringement by a fine of $500 and three months' imprisonment, or both; and the giving by the employer and receiving of the same by the employé, though intended and accepted as such, shall not operate as payment or extinguish any liability.

SEC. 29. That the judge of the district court aforesaid may, in his discretion, refer any complaint under this act to any United States commissioner of his district, or referee, or master in chancery of his court, who shall thereupon exercise the same powers and perform the same duties imposed upon the judge by this act: Provided, That the authority of the said commissioner, master in chancery, or referee shall not extend beyond the filing of the award: And provided further, That no dispute of sufficient magnitude to involve the public peace or order shall be so referred.

Form of the award, to be written at the foot or upon the back of the order of the justices certifying the reference.

We, A, B, and C [name and describe the arbitrators], the arbitrators appointed to settle the matters in dispute between the parties within named [or A, one of the arbitrators so appointed; or B, the other arbitrator appointed having failed to attend; or C D, the judge, as the case may be], do hereby adjudge and determine that [here set forth the determination, to which the arbitrators or judge, as the case may be, shall subscribe their names].

Form of indorsement extending the time limited for making the award.

We, A B and C D, parties to the within arbitration, do hereby agree to extend the same to the —— day of —— inclusive.

Witness our hands, this —— day of ——.

A B.
C D.

Witness:

Given under my hand and seal, at ——, the —— day of ——.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of this proposed substitute may be dispensed with, and that it be printed entire in the RECORD.

Mr. NEGLEY. I wish to know whether this is an American bill, or whether it was designed for the English Parliament. I see toward the conclusion a reference to "his present majesty."

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. That phrase is stricken out in the copy which the clerk is reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] asks unanimous consent that the remainder of this bill, which is only read as a part of his remarks, may be printed in the RECORD. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I wish to reserve the right to object until the gentleman explains whether the phrase "fifth year of the reign of his present majesty" means the second year of the present administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. GLOVER. There is a typographical error in this bill as originally printed, which has been corrected in the copy sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. Chairman, I now surrender the floor to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], reserving the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has ten minutes of the thirty minutes yielded to him.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to all arbitration for the adjustment of industrial controversies or disputes between labor and capital which is based upon legislative enactment, whether it be voluntary or compulsory. Hence I am opposed to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER], and I am opposed to the bill of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] and the bill introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL]. All these bills, unlike the measure now under consideration by the House, favor and provide for compulsory arbitration. Without the spirit of mutual conciliation, the disinterested desire to amicably adjust differences of opinion, arbitration is a nullity, and must necessarily fail.

The idea that men can be forced and compelled to be conciliatory is repugnant to the human mind. To be concise, arbitration means the submission of differences and controversies to the judgment and decision of one man. The adjuncts are the machinery or means of determining who that man shall be. The measures introduced in this House embodying the compulsory principle all give a judge of the United States courts the power of determining who that man shall be. I am not prepared by my vote to place the rights, the destinies, and the liberties of the laboring men of this Republic in the keeping of the judges of the courts of the United States. There is in my mind a well-grounded fear that these officials are by training and association more in sympathy with corporations than with those who are compelled to earn their daily bread by daily toil. If one of the bills providing for compulsory arbitration should become a law, a United States judge in Chicago could imprison a brakeman in New York without trial or due process of law by the State or municipal courts.

Without stopping to inquire into the constitutionality of such a law, the principle involved is so abhorrent to every sense of justice and right that I recoil from it with horror. I am not prepared to give the judges of the courts of the United States the right to imprison men for contempt, to coerce by the military arm of the Government men who are honestly contending for a principle they believe to be right. Compulsory arbitration would so fetter and shackle labor that its freedom and its right to organize for self-protection would eventually disappear. As to the bill now before the House, which is a substitute for the bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] yesterday, I am not prepared to say that I will vote against it; I may possibly vote for it, for the same reason that I would drink a glass of water—it might do me no good, but it would certainly do me no harm. [Laughter.] It will injure nobody to pass this bill; we may safely vote for it. If it will not benefit labor, it certainly will not injure it. It is a very harmless measure, but there is no arbitration in it. There is less of the principle of arbitration in this bill than there is flesh upon the dried and bleached bones of a doctor's anatomical skeleton. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] thinks some one may be deceived by it. I think that is hardly possible.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is true of all arbitrations.

Mr. FORAN. No; it is not true of all arbitrations. Where men bind themselves by agreement to arbitrate, as in law, it is different. But the trouble with this bill is it accomplishes nothing because it provides for nothing that does not now exist. Take the present difficulty in the Southwest, for instance. Suppose this bill was in force as a law when that trouble arose, and the Knights of Labor submitted to Mr. Gould a proposition to arbitrate the matters in controversy, would he have acceded? We know he would not. He was asked to arbitrate, but refused. If he now partially consents to such a course it is because he has become convinced that it is to his interest to do so, not because he favors the principle of arbitration or because he has any love for the Knights of Labor. But suppose you pass this bill, what do you accomplish?

If both parties to a controversy agree to arbitrate under its provisions, the board for which it provides becomes a board of investigation and inquiry. It can publish its findings of fact and give its opinion as to who is right or who is wrong. And there it stops; it can go no further. This might be of some utility and benefit if in every case of controversy the investigation could be had. But either party can refuse to be investigated. Then what does the bill accomplish that may not be accomplished without it? But suppose the board is appointed and the investigation had, the corporation can ignore its findings and sneer at its recommendations. But it will be claimed that an enlightened public opinion will force the party in the wrong to respect that opinion and accede to its judgment. If this be true, then the bill should be so perfected as to compel the investigation, not the arbitration, in every instance.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to arbitration in labor disputes which is based upon statutory enactment, because arbitration can only succeed when it is resorted to by the free, voluntary act of both parties.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is what this is.

Mr. FORAN. If it is the free, voluntary act of the parties may it not be had without this proposed law?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Have you now the power in voluntary arbitration to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths in order to get at the bottom of any one of these controversies?

Mr. FORAN. No, you have not, that is true; nor can you even if you pass this bill, for either party can refuse to be investigated. Besides, if both parties to a controversy do not enter into the agreement to arbitrate with a disposition to abide by the result, if they have not that spirit of conciliation and mutual forbearance when they meet, and an earnest desire to adjust the differences between them, then all the laws you can put upon the statute-books of the United States from now until the end of this Congress will avail you nothing. Hence, from the very nature of man statutory arbitration is not desirable, even if it were possible. This, Mr. Chairman, is the great difficulty. I doubt if the labor problem can be solved or settled in any of its phases by arbitrary legislative enactment. You certainly can not solve the problem by passing this bill; and I doubt whether you can or could solve it by any measure you have the constitutional power to pass. It is deeper and wider and vaster in its scope than the effect of any law you might enact could possible reach.

But what I was proceeding to say when interrupted was that if we propose to pass this bill, and if we expect to accomplish anything by its passage, we must amend it. Should it become a law as it reads at present all it could accomplish would be to furnish the means of investigating existing labor troubles and publishing the findings of fact upon which public opinion could be based. But, sir, I am of the opinion that in these controversies the stronger party, the corporation, is generally the aggressor and as the bill now stands can refuse to be investigated. If we are to pass the bill let us so perfect it as to get all the good we can out of it. If its object is to mold public opinion, let us so amend it that in every instance there will be something for public opinion to act upon, and in the direction of that thought I propose to offer at the proper time the amendment which I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read as a part of my remarks.

Add at the end of section 1 the following:

"Provided, That if upon the written proposition of either party to the controversy to submit their differences to arbitration the other party shall refuse to accede to the proposition to so arbitrate, the party submitting the proposition to arbitrate as aforesaid may request the judge of the United States district court within whose jurisdiction the controversy exists and the parties reside to appoint the person or arbitrator provided for by the section; and said judge, upon being so requested and upon being satisfied that one of the parties to the controversy has refused to arbitrate as herein provided, is hereby authorized and directed to forthwith appoint said person or arbitrator."

Mr. FORAN. This amendment, I admit, is not in such shape as I would like to have it. It was written or drawn very hurriedly—upon the spur of the moment. This whole matter has been sprung upon the House as it was upon the committee, almost without notice. I appreciate and commend the motives which prompted the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] in bringing this matter before the House before members were prepared to be heard upon it. The situation is critical, and urgency is, perhaps, deemed important. The object of my amendment is to compel an investigation in every instance. The ascertainment of facts is the only merit the bill has, but if it is left in the power of either party to prevent the ascertainment of the truth the law will be worse than a nullity. For, as the bill now stands, when a controversy arises and one party submits to the other a proposition to arbitrate, the arbitration or investigation does not necessarily, it simply may, follow.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Why is that not an arbitration?

Mr. FORAN. I will show why it is not arbitration. After your board has convened and after it has investigated the facts and published its findings it may be ignored and repudiated by either party. At best it is merely advisory.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAN. Certainly.

Mr. NEGLEY. Would there not be constitutional restrictions to the enforcement of any law against corporations where their property is entirely situated within the limits of a single State?

Mr. FORAN. Undoubtedly; though I have no doubt whatever of the power of Congress to regulate these corporations when their lines extend through the States or Territories.

Mr. NEGLEY. Is not the remedy, therefore, if it is to be enforced by statute, limited to the States and to action by the States rather than by the General Government?

Mr. FORAN. I am not willing to concede that proposition. I seriously doubt if any gentleman upon this floor fully comprehends this question or can prescribe a remedy for it, but that the General Government has not some power in the premises I am not willing to admit.

Mr. NEGLEY. Assenting to your views is the reason I make the inquiry.

Mr. FORAN. This labor question is a problem that the civilized world has been endeavoring to solve for three hundred years, and the solution does not seem to be much nearer to-day than when students in history and political science first seriously grappled with it; and yet this Congress is called upon to settle the whole question in a day by the passage of this bill, without mature reflection or time for intelligent discussion and consideration. Such a proposition, Mr. Chairman, is nonsense run mad. It can not be done. The best efforts of the best minds for ages past have failed to solve the problem or discover the remedy. That the world's wage-workers have cause for serious complaint no honest, thinking man denies. We have only to look around us to be convinced of this.

One of the most orthodox of recent political economists, Mr. Rae, in his work, "Contemporary Socialism, says "that the immense increase of wealth which has marked the present century has been attended with surprisingly little amelioration in the general lot of the people, and it is in no way remarkable that this fact should tend to dishearten the laboring classes and fill reflective minds with serious concern." Another of the most careful, thorough, and conservative thinkers of the age, Mr. Cairnes, after contrasting the condition and status of the wealthy with the poorer classes, says:

It seems to me, apart altogether from the question of the laborer's interest, that these are not conditions which furnish a solid basis for a progressive social state.

But let us look at our own country. What do we find? I will not direct attention to the poverty of the masses or the wanton extravagance of the wealthy. These things are familiar to us all. But let us look at some hard facts. In thirty years, from 1850 to 1880, the net product of our manufactures increased from $437,000,000 to $1,834,000,000, or over 400 per cent., while during the same period the average annual wages increased from $248 to $346, or about 40 per cent. These figures tell their own story. Comment can not add to their force. There is, then, an appalling evil. But where is the remedy? If you can pass laws here which will more equitably distribute the product of labor and capital or wealth, arbitration laws will be unnecessary, for there would be no differences to arbitrate. The root of the evil is too deep to be reached by a remedy of this kind.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is not the purpose of this bill indirectly to effect that end?

Mr. FORAN. It can not be the purpose of the bill, for it has no purpose. If it had it could not reach it, and I doubt if any legislation can, for the difficulty is inherent in the very nature of man, and the remedy will be found by an appeal to the very sentiment which creates the evil. The poor suffer because of the heartless cupidity and selfishness of the rich, and they will continue to suffer until that selfishness is appealed to by a process which will inspire stronger motives than those which actuate it now. Let me say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] that just as soon as capitalists and wealthy men are made to understand and realize that the preservation of their property interests and the perpetuation of their rights in property depend upon that contentment and happiness of the people which is the only guarantee for obedience to law and order, rather than upon statutes which may be disregarded, then this problem will be upon the eve of solution. If men like Jay Gould can not read the lesson which past experience teaches and can not understand that the safety of property, the security of life, and the existence of government is menaced and imperiled by a system which gives to capital 400 per cent. and to labor but 40, they may rest assured that sooner or later the lesson and all that it implies will be so forcibly presented that even they will comprehend it.

A community or State in which the great mass of the people are so dissatisfied with their condition that life itself becomes almost unbearable can hardly be said to be a community or State in which a capitalist would care to invest.

Mr. NEGLEY. That is the state of affairs existing now, but what you seek is the enactment of a law which will provide a remedy or bring about an equitable adjustment of the disputes between labor and capital and relieve the wage-worker from oppression and coercion.

Mr. FORAN. I am not seeking to pass a law in this direction. I do not believe the remedy is wholly in legislation. If you could pass laws which would create conditions out of which greater prosperity would be evolved, and so enforce these laws as to more justly and equitably distribute this prosperity among the people, your legislation would be of some practical utility. But can you do it?

Mr. NEGLEY. Nobody differs with you upon that point.

Mr. FORAN. If present conditions are to continue until they produce the natural and inevitable results which must flow from such conditions, it will not be the fault of those of us who have called attention to these things and given a timely note of warning.

Mr. NEGLEY. If we are merely enacting sentiment let us do it discreetly, at all events, and show our respect for so grave a question.

Mr. FORAN. I must beg the gentleman to not further interrupt me. I can not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. NEGLEY. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy in yielding to me thus far.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seventeen minutes.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to make a speech to-day. In fact I was not aware that this question was to be considered, but in the line of thought suggested by my remarks, permit me to give my views as to the remedy. A celebrated statesman of Europe, Count Cavour, once said:

> Equality in rights will never abolish iniquity in conditions. There is therefore only one manner of preventing socialism, and that is that the superior classes shall consecrate themselves to the amelioration of the lower classes. Otherwise civil war will be inevitable.

We recognize no superior or lower classes in this country; we recognize no standard of merit but intelligence and worth, but substitute for superior and lower classes the rich and the poor. And are not the words of Cavour true in America to-day? Is this not the solution of the problem? Poverty we can not wholly eliminate from the world. Indeed, it is not desirable to do so. The desire to accumulate and acquire property is the great force, the dominant factor which quickens and stimulates human energy and individual effort. To take poverty out of the world would be to destroy labor, and we all know that labor is the supreme law of human existence. Socialism substitutes a world of fancy for a world of fact and reality. It is despotism of the most pronounced character, for under its régime the individual disappears; he ceases to be a free man and becomes a mere piece of mechanism. "Slavery does not more completely than socialism destroy the personality of man;" and I have no hesitancy in saying the measures introduced here, providing for compulsory arbitration, are redolent of the odor of socialism. Hence I am opposed to them.

Our present social system is perhaps the best that could be devised for man as we find him. Perhaps, through the evolving processes of a higher and broader intellectuality, a better system may, in the future, be discovered. But we are dealing with the present. Jay Gould says the Knights of Labor must respect his rights. To this I agree. But I say to Mr. Gould that while labor will respect his rights, it demands that he perform his duties under the social compact. Suppose this man accumulated his millions through legitimate channels, and that is a very violent assumption, but suppose it to be true. Property is not purely an individual fact. There is no property that can be so considered. The power and the influence of society, the forces which it puts in operation, its commerce, its schools, its laws all operate and aid in the production of property.

Does Mr. Gould owe nothing to society? Does he owe nothing to the Knights of Labor, who are so many integers in our social system? What is the object of society? Is it not to improve the status of and give value to the individual; does it not mean the cultivation of every faculty of the mind, and the social, moral, and intellectual development of human nature? Society will respect your rights, Mr. Gould, but you must perform your duty to society. You must remember with De Lamartine that in society the moral zone must penetrate the legal zone. If you fail to learn this lesson and its application and evil comes to you, the fault will be your own.

At present men of the Gould stamp seem to have adopted Hobbes's view of society—homo homini lupus: man is to man a wolf; and to prey upon their fellow-men seems to them the only aim and object of existence. But they will yet learn, through the medium of enlightened public sentiment and higher intelligence, or through stern and bitter experience, that man and not money is the object of society; that to lift men up to a higher social and intellectual plane is more commendable than the accumulation of large fortunes. Let capital take what belongs to it and render unto labor its due and strikes and social disorder will disappear. This is simple justice.

Is any man on this floor willing to admit that he is not in favor of justice? That is all labor wants. In France they are much nearer a solution of this problem than we are. The profit-sharing system has been there introduced. Capitalists are there dividing the profits with their workmen, and where this system has been tried and is in force strikes are unknown. Will the capitalists of America follow the example? Perhaps not at present; but they will eventually, because they must. And now, Mr. Chairman, permit me again to say I see nothing in this bill for which to vote. It may keep the word of promise to the ear of labor, but it will break it to its hope. I would sooner trust the Knights of Labor and kindred organizations whose members are seeking through organization higher idealities and greater intelligence to eventually bring about such a consensus of public opinion as will force justice from such men as Jay Gould than any legislation of this character. If you keep your hands off of labor, pass no laws against it or in favor of monopoly, and it will take care of itself. The only laws we can pass in the interest of labor are those giving it greater and more perfect freedom.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. FORAN. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. FORAN. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] has promised to give me five minutes. I would like to know before beginning to speak if I am to have those five minutes in addition to the time yielded to me by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GLOVER. I have only ten minutes remaining, but I have promised the gentleman from Georgia five minutes, and I yield that time to him.

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not know that I shall use the whole of the twelve minutes allotted.

I know how very delicate all matters connected with labor are, and I trust that I duly appreciate the great importance of the questions at stake this morning. Because I do consider them very important I take the floor without any thought of what I shall say, except what comes at the moment. Without any possible means of knowing the views of the House, but simply to assert my own convictions I speak, because I feel it my duty to assert them.

I never owned and never intend to own a dollar of stock in any transportation company in the world. I have no interest in this matter except that which is common to every citizen of the United States. I am opposed to this bill and to the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER]. The bill itself has been characterized on the other side as a "fraud." I will not be so unkind to my own side of the House as to say I believe that. But I am too respectful to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to join issue with him on that assertion.

The bill proposes that when people desire they may arbitrate; that the United States shall pay the expenses of the arbitrations, and when they are done the United States shall furnish an office in which the useless papers may be filed.

Mr. Chairman, the laboring men of this country have too much intelligence to be deceived by such stuff. In every State in this Union they may have voluntary arbitrations. In every State of this Union when they procure voluntary arbitrations and awards are made they are made the judgment of the court unless objected to according to law. And when so made may be enforced. I prefer those laws to this proposed remedy.

It is said there is nothing new under the sun; and having been a lawyer a great part of my life, I begin to believe there is no new case under the sun. Once, when the supreme court of Georgia was very exacting, dismissing cases upon technicalities, I sat by a lawyer who saw a case by which he set great store so dismissed. He said to a friend sitting by him, "What can a man do when the highest judicial tribunal of his State makes a fool of itself?" To which his friend replied, "Nothing but keep his temper and appeal to the enlightened consciences of the American people." That case is exactly in point here. When the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] is asked, "What remedy have you?" He answers, "Nothing but public opinion." Congress is asked to legislate, to pay the expenses of tribunals which tribunals can have their judgments enforced in no way except by "public opinion." The statement of it makes the proposition ridiculous.

The gentleman from Missouri called this arbitration a tribunal. Congress has a right to make tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court of the United States. By the second section of Article III of the Constitution the judicial power of that court, as well as of other Federal "inferior tribunals," is limited to certain things. Among those limitations is that they must be controversies between citizens of different States. This bill raises a tribunal of the United States, paid by the United States, that undertakes to settle (without the power to settle) controversies which may be between citizens of the same State. It was for that very reason—mixing intra-State with extra-State affairs—that the law as to the trade-marks was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Look at the haste with which this great proposition is treated. On the 22d of this March the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] introduced his bill. On the 24th of this March a gentleman on the other side, without conference with the committee—for he was opposed on the floor by the chairman of the committee—obtained unanimous consent that that committee might at any time report bills on this subject. On yesterday a bill was introduced by Mr. O'NEILL, the chairman of that committee. The House remained in session after it was introduced until 5 o'clock p. m. If that committee sat at all legally it must have been after that time. It comes in this morning with a report of two lines and a substitute for Mr. O'NEILL'S bill, and with a divided committee. That substitute differs from the original bill in striking out all compulsory features and requiring arbitrators to be citizens of the United States, which the bill introduced yesterday did not require.

Mr. Chairman, I have stated enough to show that I believe both this bill and this substitute to be unconstitutional. Gentlemen may not rest upon the commerce clause judicial powers. All judicial powers exercised by this Government must stand for their basis upon Article III, section 1 and section 2, of the Constitution, the judicial clauses.

I do not know how these evils are to be cured, but I do know that when we take days upon days to consider other minor propositions, to crowd through such a thing as this without thought, without debate, is trifling with one of the grandest subjects that ever engaged the attention of the House of Representatives. Mr. Chairman, the laboring men of this country should be careful of too-speedy measures and too-eager advocates on such subjects.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] has declared that unless this bill is enacted into law, unless we apply this milk-poultice to the bite of a rattlesnake, so to speak, there will be compulsory process by the United States to make corporations do their duty to labor. Mr. Chairman, when you provide process that will compel the corporations to do their duty to labor, the same bill must have in it the right to compel labor to do its duty to corporations; process must be the same for both parties. Are we ready for that; to vote that United States judges or United States arbitrators may decide these questions and may imprison for contempt every laborer who refuses to abide their decisions?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. HAMMOND. It is a good time to stop with that grave question.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reply to what has been said and to submit my own views upon the merits of this bill and the substitute and upon the situation to which these bills are intended to apply. Let me state some of the difficulties that meet us at the threshold of this problem. Here is a great railroad system dominated by a single mind. That system has in its employ from eight to ten thousand men. A controversy arises between the management of the road and its employés. Now, in attempting to provide by law for arbitration we must necessarily meet face to face with grave difficulties.

It were impossible to create a court that shall have jurisdiction of men who are not parties to the record. To illustrate, the present difficulty (or the one happily adjusted on yesterday, as we were informed by the morning papers) arose over the discharge of one Hall, who was in the employ of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company. The other laborers employed in that system espoused his cause and refused to work until Hall was reinstated, or until an arbitration should ensue, which involved his right to be reinstated if the arbitrators should so decide. Now, this body may have the power to create a court to take jurisdiction of a case in which Hall and his employers may be parties, but an adjudication between Hall and Gould could not bind the 9,999 other men who have struck in the interest of the rights of Hall, for the plain reason that they would not be parties of record nor in any way bound by the arbitration. If you provide for compulsory arbitration (which is a misnomer) you could not in any event bind any one except Mr. Hall, and perhaps Mr. Gould, and that would depend upon the nature of the matters involved.

In no event could the award reach the great body of laborers, except as it might tend to arouse public sentiment and public opinion. No court now in existence or which we may create can say to Mr. Hall, you shall work for Mr. Gould, nor can a court say to Mr. Gould, you shall employ Mr. Hall. These men may agree concerning these things themselves, and resolute, organized labor may open Mr. Gould's eyes until he can see clearly that it is to his interest to yield; but you can not reach the difficulty by statute. It is clear beyond the sphere of either legislative or judicial tribunals.

So this whole question must be left to public opinion after all, and I am frank to state to the House that I am opposed in judgment to all legislation with regard to these strikes, because in its very nature it can not be effective and can not afford the remedy that we desire. Sir, I am not a believer in the power of legislation to cure the evils to which society is heir—I mean direct legislation. I am a believer in the kind of legislation that will create conditions out of which prosperity may be evolved and under which evils may die away. Now, what are the primary causes of the present discontent throughout the country?

I assert here and maintain that they result because of a neglect on the part of the lawmaking power of this country to make suitable provision to preserve the prosperity of the Republic. I will be specific and point out instances of such neglect. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce among the States. What is commerce? What does that provision of the Constitution mean? Does it mean that Congress has power to fix the price of goods sold in New York and shipped to Arkansas? Certainly not. Does it mean that Congress has the power to fix the price of cattle raised in Iowa and sold in New York? Certainly not. What does it mean? It means this, that Congress shall have power to regulate the great instruments through which commerce is carried on.

What are those instruments? They are three in number, namely, money, transportation, and the transmission of intelligence. These are the three great instruments of commerce, and without them or without any one of them commerce, as understood in modern times, were impossible. Now, the Constitution says that Congress shall exercise that power. It is in its very nature exclusive, and has so been held by all the courts. It can be exercised by Congress and by nobody else; yet during the past quarter of a century, which has witnessed the upgrowth of these mighty corporations, Congress instead of regulating interstate commerce has abdicated and relegated that power to a few syndicates and the heads of great corporations, who are regulating commerce, but regulating it in their own interest and to the detriment of the people.

These evils are properly chargeable to Congress. We are sworn to support the Constitution, and yet we have refused to exercise the sovereign power with which the Constitution clothes us. The grant of power carries with it the corresponding duty on our part to exercise it. The neglect or refusal to discharge these plain duties has allowed monstrous evils to grow up unmolested, until to-day they have control of the entire machinery of Government, and are stronger, it would seem, than the Government itself. Their promoters, however, will find that they are not stronger than the people, deeply wronged and, let us hope, thoroughly now aroused. My sympathy, sir, is with the laboring people of this country whose toil feeds, clothes, and shelters us all. Thousands of them are out of employment and have not where to lay they heads. I feel for them in their unequal struggle, and no iron hand shall be laid upon them if I can prevent it. The proper remedy for these troubles does not lie in such a bill as this, though I consider it harmless and shall vote for it.

The remedy must come from a different class of legislation. This Congress can in a single week, if they so desire, cause the whole nation to shout for joy. We can drive darkness and distrust and business gloom and despair from every hamlet in America. The remedy must come from a proper law passed here to regulate interstate commerce. Secondly, it must come from a law which shall create conditions under which the employer can afford to pay the laboring man a reasonable price for his toil and under which a laborer can afford to work for the wages which the employer is thus enabled to pay. These are the only conditions under which prosperity will ever return to this country. Any other expedient is simply an attempt to put a salve on the cancer.

There is no desire on the part of the laboring men of this country to violate law. Nor is there any desire on their part to lead a life of vagabondage. Such insinuations are a libel upon the laboring people of this country.

I believe there is a desire in the breasts of nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand of them to earn their living in the sweat of their faces. But the trouble is they can not get the opportunity to work at reasonable wages, and thousands of them not at all.

The only hope of tranquillity in this country, the only hope of harmony and peace between employers and employés is to give this country a sufficient volume of currency. [Laughter.] Ah! laugh if you please; but "he laughs best who laughs last." Divide if you please these suffering, penniless people, many of whom are working for 90, and I see by the papers, as low as 55, cents per day. Laugh at them if you have the heart to do it. [Applause.]

I say you must have a volume of currency that will make it more profitable for a man to invest his money than to hoard it. Then the currency will come into circulation, and hope and joy will bloom again, and the spindles will sing, and your furnaces glow, and strikes and lockouts will be unheard-of in the land.

I assert here, let him contradict who will, that this labor controversy the world over is purely a question of money, and nothing else. There is just enough money in this country to-day to enable the corporations to corner it. Just enough to enable the banks and the usurers to extort usury. Ay, there are three classes of vampires who are sucking up the last drop of the blood of honest toil—the land monopolies, the railroad monopolies, and the money monopolies. And if my voice can reach beyond the walls of this House to the humble abodes of suffering labor throughout the land, I say to the toiling millions of this country, you must overthrow these three great confederated monopolies, and this can only be done by proper legislation. Hence, you must strike at the ballot-box, and strike against every man who is full of promises when he is a candidate, but who disappoints you after he reaches his seat in this House.

The only proper remedy in a republic for popular evils is through the exercise of the ballot. Strikes are only justifiable as a dernier ressort. If this Congress will not protect labor it must protect itself. But we hear it said there is more money now in the money centers than can be used. Yes, sir; I once had the fever; and there was more blood in my lungs than I had any use for at that point; but there was not enough at the extremities. [Laughter.] That is the condition of this country to-day. There is not enough blood circulating in the body-politic to relieve the paralysis and enable the extremities to perform their functions.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It is never any interruption to ask me a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. When the gentleman had the lung fever and had too much blood in his lungs, did he get well by making more blood?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I never heard of an instance of that kind.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The physician put me upon a healthful, nutritious diet, increased the amount of blood, the heart grew stronger and properly distributed the life-giving fluid throughout my system. [Applause].

Mr. GALLINGER. That is not a scientific proposition.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. My blood would never have ceased to perform its functions had it not been impeded or impaired by something. As soon as that obstruction was removed my health was restored.

The circulation of currency to-day is impeded. It is under the control of two disturbing forces or influences. First, it is under the control of the national banking institutions, who have the power to bleed the patient whenever they please, and they are bleeding him at the rate of $15,000,000 per annum. Yes, sir; they are literally bleeding this country to death. Then there is the gentleman who controls the keys of the strong-box at the Treasury, and he rushes the blood into the heart and locks it up there, and will not let it circulate. No wonder the country is sick. Blood-clotted at the heart, and blood wasting away at an artery severed by the banks. No wonder that some portions of the body-politic are involved in trouble. Now, I ask that these causes which impede the circulation of our money shall be taken away first of all. Stop this bleeding and locking-up process, and then if the business sense of the country says we have money enough, I will not ask to have a dollar added to the circulation; we certainly have none to spare now. In the name of starving labor I plead with this House to correct these evils, and I warn this Congress before the American people not to adjourn without passing needful laws to curb the rapacity of the confederated monopolies.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand the gentleman from Iowa to argue that our difficulties now lie in a deficiency of volume of money. I wish to ask him how it happens that in 1880 and 1881, when business was so prosperous in this country, we had a certain volume per inhabitant, and to-day, with a larger volume of money than we had in circulation then, business is so depressed?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question. The panic began in 1873, and lasted until 1879. The prosperity which the gentleman speaks of in 1880 and 1881 was only a temporary rebound. It was delusive to both laborers and business men. They did not understand the real situation nor the power that was left in the hands of the banks nor the hostile purposes of the Treasury officials. They made their investments and found that they had followed a false light. The delusion was soon dispelled, and we have had no prosperity since. The return to prosperity was merely spasmodic, and prices began to fall, and fall, and fall, and are falling yet; so that we have had at least ten years of panic since 1873. [Several voices, "That is so!"] We have had no prosperity, and we have none now. We have depression throughout this entire country.

Look, Mr. Chairman, at the anomalous condition of affairs. I am glad I have the attention of the House. Is it not most astonishing when we have an increasing population—almost two millions a year added to our population—is it not most astonishing that we should have coexisting a decreasing circulating medium? The national banks are contracting their notes at least $15,000,000 per annum. It is true we are coining $24,000,000 of silver per year, but a large portion of that is locked up in the Treasury as fast as it is coined. The Secretary has the power to call in, and he has the funds to pay fully $100,000,000 of the debt of the United States if he would only do it. He can put that much money into circulation within a very brief period. There is power in the Congress of the United States to compel him to do this. And yet you do not require him to do so. Is it any wonder that suffering labor is losing confidence in our Government?

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say a word further—I did not intend to say it when I began—but there is another difficulty underlying the whole subject: There is no policy or purpose in this House to-day in either one of the great political parties represented upon this floor. Now let me prove the truth of that assertion. I say it in all kindness, but it is a duty which I owe to the people to say it. You may be a high-protective-tariff man or a free-trader and still be either a Democrat or a Republican, just as you choose. You can be an anti-bank man or a bank man and be a member of either of the parties represented upon this floor—except the Greenback party. [Laughter.] You can be a monopolist or an anti-monopolist; you can be a monometallist or a bimetallist; you can be a Blair-bill man or an anti-Blair-bill man, and still be an acceptable member of either of the old parties.

I defy any man—and I say it with all due solemnity, because I know it to be true—I defy any man before God to name a thing that a man has to believe in order to become a member of either of these two parties, nor can he point out what it is that if he does believe it will debar him from membership. [Laughter.] These are severe remarks, I know, but they are true, as I believe, before God; and I take the responsibility to utter them, believing it to be my duty to the American people to do so. [Several voices, "It is true."]

What is the result? A lack of policy. We are all full of the spirit of reform when we are before the people. In our several districts we are all reformers. Oh! yes; the poor laboring man's ears are full of promises, and he says after he has listened to these lavish assurances, "I am going to vote for him; he is a good man, and I believe in him."

But, Mr. Chairman, when we come into this House these things are all forgotton, and the great reformer in the district, when he gets here, roars like a sucking dove. [Laughter.] Why? Because, if he enforces his particular views, some other member in his own party says, "If you carry out that doctrine or pledge you can not carry Pennsylvania or you can not carry New York or some other State." Is not that true? There is no policy here in either party, no purpose, nothing, I fear, but death and disintegration. Evils are rampant, but Congress is deaf and blind.

The remedy must come from a purpose on the part of the majority of the House—and I say this in all kindness, to stir up our pure-minded men by way of remembrance—the remedy must come from those having power, from the majority, from this Democratic House, taking hold of these questions with courage and then pressing them for consideration and passage.

We must have a purpose. We must have tests of membership. Every organization in the world that is worth anything has tests of membership. The Masons have them, the Odd Fellows have them, the Knights of Labor have them, the churches have them, but here the great political parties of this country have none, and a man may believe anything about heaven, hell, or human government and be an acceptable member of either organization. [Great laughter.]

A MEMBER. How about the Greenback party?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The gentleman asks me about the Greenback party. Why, we have tests of membership. No man can be a member of the Greenback party who believes in the national-bank monopoly, or who believes in turning over to monopolists the right to regulate interstate commerce. No man can be a member of the Greenback party who believes in contraction or in a perpetual debt, or who believes in land monopoly, or who believes in locking our money in the Treasury when we have debts that are due and payable. [Applause.]

Let me say to you, my Democratic friends, that we Greenbackers in Iowa affiliate with you and here in this House as far as we can, but, reserving to ourselves all the time the right to our own independence and the independence of the organization, we ask the Democratic party to do something. This request is not unreasonable. We want to have you relieve this death-stricken country. If the Democratic party will do anything for the people of this country, we say, amen. We will help you to do it.

The first caucus held by the Democratic party after the election of the first President of the United States elected by that party after an interval of twenty-five years took place in this Hall, and while I am not permitted to say here what took place in that caucus, I have not seen it intimated in any of the public prints that anything whatever was done as agreed upon. [Laughter.] And now our Republican friends held their caucuses, and what have they done?

A MEMBER. Oh, no; they have not held any.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Oh, yes; they held them at the other end of the Capitol several times, and you held one here to decide who you would nominate for Speaker of the House, and I do not know how many more. But did you in your caucuses give to the people of the United States any great measure of reform or inaugurate any great measure that would be of benefit to the people? You did not; and while caucuses have been held at the other end of the Capitol, if I may be permitted to speak of what took place there, to determine whether the Senate had a right to call upon the President for papers referring to appointments of postmasters in the United States, I have not seen that anything has been done or seriously urged by your party for the laboring people. They have declared their right to demand these papers. No doubt the millions of hungry people feel greatly relieved and sleep sweetly since the passage of that resolution. [Laughter.]

Now, I say in conclusion that we must address ourselves to this legislation. If we do not, we may expect retributive justice to be meted out to us when we go before the people in the ensuing campaign, and either ask for ourselves or our friends their indorsement at the ballot-box. Can it be possible that there is no intention on the part of this House to relieve the distress of the country? We shall see.

I now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED, of Maine. I ask the gentleman to give me fifteen minutes.

Mr. WEAVER. I will give the gentleman fifteen minutes, and the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest delusions in the world is the hope that the evils in this world are to be cured by legislation. I am happy in the belief that the solution of the great difficulties of life and government are in better hands even than that of this body, which I respect very much.

More than a hundred years ago Lord Mansfield, a name great in English jurisprudence, was at the head of the English judiciary at a time when England was just beginning to be the great commercial nation of the world. Its laws which had grown up under the old feudal system were not adapted to the free transaction of business such as the growth of modern life demanded. That wise man when called upon to administer the laws selected special juries of men conversant with the custom of merchants to decide the questions resulting from the new laws of trade, and the result was an expansion of English law which made it fit that England should become the great commercial nation of the world. That idea of following the proceedings of great bodies of men and transmutting them into laws and statutes is the only safe thing for a court or for a legislative body.

We seem to have come now to the beginning of what may be a failure, or what may be a great expansion of true liberty and fraternity, which may be the beginning of a great era, giving larger freedom, giving fairer treatment, both to the humble and the great. It becomes us as Representatives of the people, in the midst of whom these transactions are going on, to give to them our careful attention, to give them our best thought, to give them our best assistance. But it will be in vain for us to attempt to evolve out of our own consciousness the solutions of these labor problems. We must do it by watching the workings of great bodies of men. Why do they come to their conclusions, and how? It is by reasoning, by trial, by experience, and by discussion among themselves.

The laboring men of this country are starting in upon the problem how they shall obtain their fair share of the joint results of capital and of labor; and I say to you, as the gentleman from Cleveland [Mr. FORAN] has so well said, this is a question the complication of which has no parallel upon the face of the earth. It is the great problem, not only of to-day but of all times. It has been struggled with and will be struggled with from day to day. Capital can not be deprived of its fair share. For if it is, men will cease to have an incentive to accumulate, and if capital is not accumulated labor can not be set to work.

The gentleman who preceded me [Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa] says there are more people who want work than can get work. The more capital you destroy the more of such workless people there will be.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I agree to that.

Mr. REED, of Maine. So that capital must be justly treated, and on the other hand the men whose work makes out of capital profits must be fairly treated also.

Now, how shall we solve this question? Is the solution to be found placarded on every fence? That is a wild dream. The problem is full of all manner of difficulties. It can only be settled from day to day. It can only be settled by discussion on the part of both parties concerned and settled with a fair disposition of both parties to look at all the facts. If it shall prove that the present uprising on the part of the industrious people of the country shall afford better facilities for comparison of views between employers and employed, then there will be laid a foundation broad and comprehensive for a full and true understanding. For if men know alike they are sure to act alike. And one thing which has separated industry and capital is because neither has fully understood the other. The apparent tendency of the line of action of great bodies of men to-day is to create such associations as will facilitate an examination of the state of trade on the part of great corporations and of small corporations, so as to decide what is a fair division between capital and labor, and to so marshal labor that it shall be on equal footing with capital. Is that utterly a new thing? In its vast extent it is new, but in detail it has been going on for years.

My friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] could tell us from his own experience that that has been going on among the printers for a long time, and I noticed that in the appearance of workingmen before the Committee of Ways and Means the only thing which they asked of us was to pass such a law with reference to imports as they desired, and then they said, "Leave it to us to get our fair share." How do they get it? They get it by combining together, by keeping a careful account of the state of the trade, by knowing what the business can bear, and asking and demanding their fair share of the profits. Now I believe that what the workingmen in Pennsylvania have done, what the workingmen of the printers' typographical unions have done, can be done by the laborers all over the country, and I believe they will settle that question advantageously among themselves. What they need and desire is that there should be that careful examination of the questions arising between employers and employés which will lead to an agreement, and if, by reason of the unreasonableness of certain men, this can not be done, then to have some method of arbitration.

But now what must an arbitration be in order to be successful? An affair between man and man you can bring compulsorily before the courts and say to the parties, "You do thus and so, or we will mulct you; we will make you pay." But how are you going to mulct the ten thousand employés of a great railroad corporation? How are you going to bring them all within such an arrangement as that? Because you are bound to consider, if you have compulsory arbitration, that it works both ways, and if you propose that the court shall appoint an arbitrator on the request of one side when the other side refuses it, you have got to suppose that it is going to be done in behalf of the workingmen, and how long would they stand or endure that? And after you have got the result of an arbitration, what then? Can you enforce it? You can not enforce the arbitrations that are going on every day between employer and employés. What does enforce them?

Why, that ultimate tribunal which is the master of us all, the public sense of all the human beings of this country. Public sentiment governs. What is it to-day that is having the greatest influence in controversies that are going on within our knowledge? Is it the one side or the other? No; it is the general community and their feeling that one side is right and that the other side is wrong, or that both are wrong and must arbitrate. And that public sentiment ultimately will govern the matter. Now, what does this bill propose? So far as it proclaims itself to be a panacea it deserves the repudiation of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]; but taking it for just what it is, refusing to advertise it as anything more, may we not say to the community, "You yourselves have not reasoned this question out so thoroughly that you know just what is fair between man and man. You have gone no further than this bill. We offer to legalize your enunciations so far as they have gone because they seem to us to be fair, and we will give you an opportunity, if you are both willing, to put the results of your arbitration before that great tribunal, the common sense of the people, which must finally decide it." Now it may turn out that this legislation will amount to but little. It may turn out that it will amount to much. Suppose we try it, and when we learn more do more. Is not that the wise course?

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to submit an amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] has yielded the balance of his time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM]. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]?

Mr. BRUMM. I will yield for a moment if it does not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will of course come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. KELLEY. I propose in all sincerity, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BRUMM. One moment. I supposed that this would not come out of my time.

Mr. KELLEY. It will take but an instant. I propose to so amend the title of this bill that instead of reading, "to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies," &c., it shall read, "to provide a possible method of settling controversies," &c.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, we all agree that some system of arbitration should be devised that would harmonize the difficulties that are apt to arise between employer and employé. The bill under consideration as it now stands will, in my judgment, be of no practical effect. It is like the resolve of the rats to bell the cat. It is all very well to pass resolutions, "Let us bell the cat;" but when it comes to putting the bell on the cat there is no rat there to do it, and the combined rats will not do it. I do not believe in attempting to pass a bill which every man who has spoken in favor of it has said can have no practical effect upon either party to the existing controversy. The strike that now exists in the Southwestern railroad system has developed a striking state of facts. First, you have the Knights of Labor by their president urging arbitration, asking that the grievances existing between the two parties be investigated, and then insisting that so far at least as the workingmen are concerned they shall stand by whatever the award of that arbitration may be. On the other hand, we have a representative of the railroad system—and I think that while Mr. Powderly is a fair representative of the one class, we have a very fair representative of the other class in Mr. Jay Gould—and what does he do? Without knowledge as to the cause of the difficulty, as soon as he disembarks from his yacht he makes no effort to investigate the trouble, but immediately appeals to the strong arm of the law—for what? For the purpose of doing justice? For the purpose of investigating facts? For the purpose of arbitrating difficulties? No; but for the purpose of intimidating, for the purpose of bulldozing, as it were, the men who, we have a right to suppose, are asking but fair treatment by this corporation. I do not know whether they are asking what is fair or unfair, nor do any of you, for you have not the facts. But Jay Gould, knowing that he is backed by the strong arm of the military if necessary, by the strong arm of the Government, asks no questions, but goes to his attorney, gets legal advice, and finds how he may invoke the strong arm of the law to prevent these men absolutely from striking.

You may say, "No; it is to prevent them from committing violence." But, mark you, in a controversy of this kind capital always has the advantage of labor, because capital has no mouths to feed. Capital practically in this view of the case has no wives to clothe and feed, no babies to take care of while a strike is going on. On the other hand, the laboring man while on a strike is absorbing his substance all the time. Capital says, "I will not do justice to you; I am not willing even that this matter shall be investigated, because if investigated my case is so bad that public opinion will strike against me; and therefore I can not afford to have this matter investigated."

Now, if by some means you can force capital into an investigation by which the facts involved may be thrown open to the public you have practically won half the battle. It is public opinion that is all-powerful in these matters. But what is public opinion worth if the public have no way of finding out the facts involved in the controversy? Therefore if you have any method by which you can enforce arbitration, you have accomplished the very purpose that my friend from Maine and all the other gentlemen who have spoken on this proposition seem to seek.

Now, how can you enforce arbitration? It is true that parties not of record can not be reached. It is true you can not coerce ten thousand people—not even a thousand. You can not reach the laboring men by direct punitive measures or vindicatory sanction of law. But you can reach the laboring man when you once give him the facts—not as stated, for instance, by Mr. Irons in this controversy; for he may tell that which is not true, and by reason of that falsehood on his part may agitate the mind of the laboring man, may incense him and induce him to stand out against all reason, so that when he sees his family starving by his side, then by the force of nature, by the law of self-preservation, he for the first time commits violence, and thus gives reason for calling out the military. So, as the leader in the labor organizations may by false statements inflame the mind of the laboring man, Mr. Gould, by refusing investigation, may give you other false statements; and between these two classes of false statements public opinion is at a loss how to decide. You have no way of finding out who is right and who is wrong in these controversies, and the result is you can not appeal to the good, honest, common-sense laboring man and secure an arbitration by which the facts may be investigated by impartial men. What we want is to be able to go to the laboring man and say, "You started out under a presumed state of facts, but the investigation shows another state of facts." In such a case the laboring man, when you appeal to his sense of justice, will be just as ready to succumb and go to work and do his duty as you or I or any other set of men in this country.

The workingmen of this country do not mean to do wrong. All they want is to be guided by wise counsel and by facts properly laid before them. Can you say as much for Jay Gould and the other men representing the interests of capital? I ask you to look at Mr. Powderly on the one hand and Jay Gould on the other. Jay Gould stands there and simply says, "I will not arbitrate with you." He stands there asking no questions as to what justice to either party may require; but he invokes the strong arm of the law, under the idea that if he holds out these people may possibly be driven to desperation and some of them perchance may be impelled by starvation to do a wrong, which shall be followed by an appeal on the part of Jay Gould to the governor to call out the military forces and to the national authority to stand back of the State authority. The result is that Jay Gould wins his fight every time.

Now, for the purpose of making this bill effectual, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may have it read in his time; it can not be offered now.

Mr. BRUMM. I will read it as a part of my remarks, and will offer it at the proper time. I propose to amend by adding at the close of the pending bill—the O'Neill bill—the following provision:

That neither party to any controversy shall be allowed to invoke or receive the aid of the Government to coerce either party, unless the party or parties applying for such aid shall be willing to submit the controversy to arbitration as aforesaid, and agree to be bound by the award of said arbitrators.

Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that the language of this provision is just what it ought to be. It was for this reason that I asked the chairman of the Committee on Labor whether we were to dispose of this bill to-day. I am inclined to think that perhaps the verbiage of this proposition may require modification; for I drew it hurriedly. But the idea is that Jay Gould shall know (and I am using him simply as an illustration—not that I have anything specially against him except that I think his conduct in this matter has been reprehensible)—that Jay Gould or the other representatives of capital shall know that unless they are willing to arbitrate, no power in this world shall set the military upon the men who are on a strike—shall know that before they can receive the aid of the Federal Government and have troops called out for the purpose of intimidation or coercion they must come with clean hands, must be able to say, "We have this difficulty which we are willing to arbitrate but the other side has refused, therefore we ask the Government to protect us and our property." When you adopt such a measure as this there is a vindicatory sanction; there is a power that will appeal to Jay Gould, that will appeal to capital generally, that will appeal to these corporations, and let them know that unless they first do their whole duty they can not receive the aid which they have generally received from the Government.

It may be said that Jay Gould may not necessarily call for this military aid; that others may call for it. But they will know that before the Government will intervene by the military arm it has a question to ask: "Have you been willing, and are you willing, to submit your grievances to a just tribunal, and have them arbitrated fairly?" If such a question is answered in the affirmative, then if there is occasion for the military, let the strong arm of the law be invoked, let the Government intervene to see that no property is destroyed and no lives taken.

What harm can there be in putting such a provision as this in the bill? Who will be hurt by it? Will capital be hurt? Will Jay Gould be hurt? Do you mean to say that they will be hurt by a measure which will simply compel them to arbitrate? Do you say that you will do an injury or injustice to them by insisting that they must lay open bald to the public gaze the issue in controversy? If by making public this issue, by letting the country know what is going on, they are to be hurt, then let them be hurt. There is no reason why you should not compel them first to say, "We are willing to arbitrate; now let the Government take care of the rest."

Mr. DANIEL. I can not bring my mind, Mr. Chairman, to the conclusion that there is wisdom in either the bill or the substitute before us; and I propose briefly to state a few general objections, leaving to others the task of elaboration.

As to the substitute offered or to be offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER], it is a bill covering some twenty pages, a most elaborate measure, copied in the main part from an English statute. This is introduced into the House without at any time having been considered in detail by a committee. It is a measure better fashioned for a country situated like Great Britain than suited to our Federal Republic. To its general theory I object. It is an effort at arbitration, one of the arbitrators to be selected by each party to the general disputation, and the third (in the failure of their electing a third), to be appointed by a United States judge, who, when he has appointed that officer, becomes magister litis, and takes charge of the whole case, to enter and to execute his decrees.

Some of the gentlemen—I will not say who is responsible for it—who draughted this bill have not given that clean-cut thought and that careful attention to it we might expect in a measure which undertakes to deal not only with a national subject, but with a great question which is international and world-wide in its scope.

I would call attention to the fact in the form presented in this bill by the United States judge to issue that it is referred to as an award "pursuant to an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of his present majesty" and addressed to a marshal of the United States. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I think this bill misconceives the entire function of the office of judge, whether that judge be a State or a United States judge. It is not for lack of laws in plenitude that there are labor agitations and difficulties in this country. In our perfected republican system we have a superabundance of laws to take hold of and deal with this subject-matter in almost every aspect in which it can be presented. You have justices of the peace all over the States; you have circuit judges and district judges and you have supreme court judges; and if indeed the matter shall pass in any one of the States beyond the skill and power of the judicial system to deal with it, you have a governor in each State, with the whole militia of that State at his back. Every governor, on the face of strikes arresting business and putting a ligature on the arteries of commerce, would seek in the first place to mold a disposition for accommodation. With all the best elements of public sentiment sustaining him he would earnestly strive to induce a settlement by arbitration. And when arbitration fails and disorder threatens the peace of society, the destruction of property, and the subversion of law, the governor has not only the militia of the State at his command, but then, as provided in the Federal Constitution and laws, the time comes for him by his voice, and not through the voice of any corporation or the employé of any corporation, to make his fair, just, and constitutional appeal to the executive power in this Government of last resort, in the person of the President, who will stand ready to aid him if things should come to such a course as to demand it. These bills, in my judgment, trench upon the prerogatives of the governors of the States and of the President of the United States as well.

Now, sir, I have not had the time to inspect carefully the substitute. It has not been fully considered by the committee, but has been tossed into the House while dealing with this great subject-matter as if we could all of a sudden "draw out leviathan with a hook," or "loose the bands of Orion."

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. GLOVER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman of Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] whether he calls attention to the typographical error which has been corrected in the bill presented as a substitute by myself this morning? And further, whether that bill has not been before the Committee on Labor during all of its deliberations, and whether it has received proper attention from them? Is not that the trouble?

Mr. DANIEL. I shall not transcend the privacy of the committee; but I think that my friend will understand that Friday is the day fixed when he himself was expected to present his own bill before that committee.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman from Virginia let me have the floor to explain that matter?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. GLOVER. The facts in regard to that matter are just these: I had an understanding that I might have an opportunity to be heard, but failing to hear from the chairman I came before the committee and received permission to present it and give my views upon the subject. I understood last night, however, they had draughted this hasty piece of legislation without considering the other measure. They did not give me the promised opportunity to present my bill and to be heard upon it. They gave me, to be sure, a few minutes this morning, but it was after their bill had already been draughted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman from Virginia will pardon me for one moment.

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I wish to say to the House, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman's bill which he has read here as a substitute has received consideration at the hands of the members of the committee, and I can state frankly to him I think it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that if it had been presented they would have been compelled to lay it upon the table. I sent him a dispatch yesterday informing him the bill I introduced would be considered this morning. It was to save him the trouble of going before the committee next Friday I told him it was decided to consider the bill this morning and that he had better come before the committee this morning. He did come and presented his views on the subject of arbitration. I did this out of a desire to extend to my colleague the fullest courtesy.

Mr. GLOVER. I do not wish to be understood as complaining, but I am only excusing myself from the charge of negligence.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to call the attention of this committee to the condition of affairs in the House committee which has reported this bill now under consideration; nor am I criticising any gentleman upon this floor. I am not saying anything harsh of any gentleman or of his action; but I am merely stating the facts, that this bill has not yet received that consideration from any committee which it was designed to receive, and hence it comes before the House in a crude form. I have not myself had full opportunity to go through all of its provisions, but wherever I have looked I have been struck with its crudities, and I have found all over this bill things which strike my mind as not wise to be adopted into the law of our land. There are numerous instances of these crudities in the bill. On page 16 I see, for instance, that this Congress is invited to deal with the controversies of capital or labor by such a provision as this:

SEC. 28. That it shall not be lawful for any employer, as defined in this act, to issue any scrip, bond, debenture, or promise to pay, for the purpose of paying employés, or to use the same for such purpose; and the employer, his or their officer or agent, who violates this provision of this act shall be punished for each infringement by a fine of $500 and three months' imprisonment, or both; and the giving by the employer and receiving of the same by the employé, though intended and accepted as such, shall not operate as payment or extinguish any liability.

In other words, under some supposed powers of Congress to regulate commerce in the United States, the Congress proposes to say to an employer that he shall not exercise his unquestioned right to issue a promissory note, and to the employé that he shall not exercise his right of receiving it in the payment of any obligation which may exist between them, and that if he shall exercise his right and receive such obligation he shall be subject to a punishment of $500 fine and three months' imprisonment.

Mr. LAWLER. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me to say to him that that is not the bill on which the committee has acted?

Mr. DANIEL. This bill is before the committee, as I understand it, now for adoption. It is a bill which was introduced and referred to the Committee on Labor on the 22d of March, 1886.

Mr. LAWLER. But it is not the bill we are considering now.

Mr. DANIEL. I am speaking now of the substitute bill which is before us for consideration.

Mr. LAWLER. But that was only offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] as a part of his argument. It is not offered for consideration by the committee at this time.

Mr. DANIEL. But it is before the House as a substitute, and my friend is mistaken in supposing that the provision which I have read is not contained in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow the Chair to interrupt him to state that the substitute to which he has referred was not submitted for the action of the committee, but was read only as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, who gave notice that he would offer it as a substitute at the proper time?

Mr. DANIEL. Then I shall confine my remarks, Mr. Chairman, to the bill under consideration, although I am in order in referring to a bill which we are duly notified of, and which has been embodied in the remarks which I am answering. We have had a large crop of bills of this kind which have been introduced and referred to the Committee of Labor. Many gentlemen seem to imagine that upon the spur of the moment, and before the mind of statesmanship or the public opinion of the country has devised any remedy or attempted remedy to meet the trouble, we can come together and instantly pass a law by Congress which will meet the difficulty. You might just as well attempt, Mr. Chairman, to deal with a case of heart disease by putting a piece of court-plaster on the top of the head as to undertake to deal with the labor troubles in any such manner as this. [Laughter.] It does not meet the question. And when one man sits in a palace resisting popular appeals and responding to them, "Damn the people!" it may well be supposed that there will be some kind of resentful response among the people who are damned. And it is not possible in the nature of things that legislation can invent a placebo which will settle these disputes without looking to or removing their causes, without change of any of the conditions out of which they spring.

The controversy between capital and labor now threatening the public peace is as old as the ages, and will be as unending as time. And it is not from any lack of statute law that you have now the difficulty, for your statutes, State, municipal, and Federal, are covered over with laws; and there are, indeed,

> Laws for all faults,
> But faults so countenanced that the strong statutes
> Stand, like the forfeits in a barber-shop,
> More in mock than mark.

As to this bill, I agree that anything that tends to arbitration or negotiation between people that are in controversy is a wise thing. Blessed are the peacemakers. But let me call the attention of the House to this fact, that this controversy in the West, which is fixing the eyes of the world, is a controversy, according to the assertions of the public press, arising out of an alleged breach of arbitration. Ever since that arbitration as alleged was broken the whole public sentiment in this country has been an appeal to the parties to come and arbitrate again, and all that moral suasion, all that public sentiment, all that the interests of society and that the counsels of wise and just men can do to bring the parties into alliance with each other is being done every moment of the day and every moment of the night during the twenty-four hours. They are themselves seeking arbitration. They can get it at any moment they can agree to have it. It is as free as air to all who want it, and there is no necessity for a court to be established to compel or to allow freemen to agree.

Now, how do we propose to deal with it? Under either the clause of the Constitution which authorizes this body to establish courts, or under the clause which authorizes it to regulate commerce between the States, or under some other occult and unnamed clause somewhere supposed to exist, it is attempted in the body of this bill to create a new United States court with most extraordinary powers. I am speaking now of the bill and not the substitute. The second section provides:

That the board of arbitration provided for in the first section of this act shall possess all the powers and authority in respect to administering oaths, subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance, preserving order during the sittings of the board, punishing for contempt, and requiring the production of papers and writings, and all other powers and privileges, in their nature applicable, now possessed and belonging to United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States.

Now, the judicial power of our country is to be conferred by Congress upon the Supreme Court, and upon inferior courts, and the judges of those courts are to be nominated and appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Here is a judicial body in the middle of this bill which has power to lay its hand upon every one of a thousand laborers who are striking or upon any employés of a corporation who will not come at its behest, or upon any witness, whoever he may be, and allow him to penetrate society, drag people from their homes, put them in jail for contempt, fine them if need be, and unearth everything that is private in correspondence or business record by calling upon them to produce it before him; and all this time no man asserting that he has a legal right which has been violated or a wrong which he wishes to avenge, but is merely quarreling over some matter of dispute between him and the man he is dealing with.

Now you propose to invest a United States officer with these extraordinary powers. I say it is a thing which, if ever heard of before in legislation, ought never to be heard of again.

Furthermore, we are told this bill is a harmless measure. As suggested by a friend at my side, I think it might prove, if it prove anything, a very expensive luxury. These two judges, constituted out of the selection of the parties in controversy, with a third who comes in as arbiter between them, have power to appoint clerks and stenographers, have all the powers of United States commissioners to bring in witnesses from anywhere before them. The seventh section provides—

That each member of said tribunal of arbitration, and the clerk, stenographer, and witnesses attending before them, shall be entitled to receive like fees or compensation as United States commissioners, and clerks, stenographers, and witnesses attending before United States commissioners; and such fees or compensation shall be payable by the United States in like manner as fees of such United States commissioners, and witnesses before such United States commissmissioners, in criminal causes, are payable under existing laws.

In other words, if you are a brakeman in the middle of Missouri, and are employed by a common carrier; if you have a dispute with the carrier or he with you, not upon a question of legal right but merely a quarrel or difference about what is a matter of free will and free action, the United States is to call in a new court, who are to summon everybody to come and tell them what they know about the facts. And then an award is to be entered and filed in the office of the Commissioner of Labor. And the people of the United States, the law-abiding, peaceable, tax-paying people of the United States, are to undertake to say beforehand to everybody who picks a quarrel with his neighbor or has a quarrel picked with him by his neighbor, if engaged in commerce between the States, "Go on and quarrel as much as you please, and we will send out and summon the world as witnesses, and we will explore trunks and private repositories for papers, and while you dance we will pay the piper;" and that under a new administration which has just come in with the idea and the hope it may avail something in the way of economy and reform.

Now, gentlemen, quarreling ought to be made an expensive luxury to the men who quarrel. I am not disposed to pass a law which shall give free play to quarreling while we have to pay the protection bounty (if so you please to call it) upon it to the quarrelers. If there is to be a successful arbitration, it has got to be spontaneous. Men who are in the death-grip of any struggle, men who have opposing ideas which array nations and States in opposite classes, are not going to have the great questions which come home to their business and bosoms settled simply because a man who calls himself a United States commissioner comes upon the scene after the governors and the judges and the people of the neighborhood have exhausted themselves in a vain effort to bring the parties together.

There is nothing in this bill except a provision for the payment of money out of the Treasury, and in my humble judgment it is trifling with one of the greatest questions now affecting and disturbing the minds of mankind to attempt to deal with it in this manner.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who believe that laws can cure all the ailments of humanity. They have got to work themselves out according to higher laws than any ever written in statute-books or framed by the tongues or lips of men. The dammed-up stream has got to find its own course, and it will find it better by the workings of nature and by the devices which come out of the efforts and the minds of those who are in the midst of the struggle, by the law of gravitation, which makes men seek their own interests and find them by peaceable means, if they can; by force, if they must. I am opposed to both these bills altogether. I would be happy to see anything done to bring about real arbitration in these controversies; but I believe that that arbitration has got to be spontaneous in its source, continuous in its growth, and the inspiration of those immediately interested. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty-eight minutes.

Mr. DANIEL. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that it has fallen to my lot to follow the splendid orator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] in the discussion of this question; but so deep is my sense of the public duty resting upon me that I feel impelled, notwithstanding the feebleness of my powers originally and by contrast, to present to this House so far as I am able the basis upon which it has been intended to procure legislation which shall put an end to the disorders connected with interstate commerce in this country—disorders which have time and again paralyzed it for long periods, to the incalculable loss of the business interests of the United States.

At the present time the situation upon the Southwest system of railroads is one to command the gravest attention of the legislator and to tax the highest powers of any person, no matter how gifted, attempting to deal therewith. The governors of two States have interposed in vain between the contending parties. The militia of a great State has been called into the field, without effect, to procure the restoration of State intercommunication.

At no time within the past three weeks during which the Knights of Labor have refused to move the trains has that community been out of danger of a repetition of the scenes which occurred in 1877, violence, bloodshed, anarchy, disorder of every kind. In the midst of peace we are, perhaps, upon the verge of war, and I say to you, gentlemen, that it is only because Congress has not dealt heretofore, and it will be so hereafter only because Congress refuses to deal now, with a question with which Congress alone can deal.

I deprecate very much the precipitation of this matter upon the House at this time by the hasty and ineffectual legislation proposed by the Labor Committee. It seems to me that a subject of such gravity might well have received more deliberate consideration. I regret very much, gentlemen, that a measure which I have deemed it my duty to submit as a substitute has been attacked as crude and ill-considered, the criticism being based apparently upon a typographical error that appears only in an old bill withdrawn from the House. We have borrowed many things from England—the right of trial by jury, half of our bill of rights, nearly the whole basis of our law; we have borrowed so much that we may well afford to borrow one thing more, and this bill is, in substance, the English act on the subject of compulsory arbitration adjusted to our judicial system and modified to meet the limited jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, there is no one who gives the workingmen in this country more credit than I give them for their conservatism, their patience, their self-denial, their disposition to obey the law and keep within its bounds. But when we have a powder magazine—and excited thousands of men are little else than a powder magazine under such circumstances, especially in view of the duplicity lately presented by the apparent violation of an agreement to arbitrate—I say when you have a powder magazine like this, a match may be applied at any moment, and the best intentioned men on earth may be led into scenes of violence and terror. At the present time it is out of the power of the local authorities to enforce the carriage of the United States mails or the transportation of the great mass of interstate traffic which passes over those lines.

I have not time to go into the telling statistics of the question, but to briefly illustrate: Since 1864, there have been in one organization alone, the cigar-makers' association of New York, three hundred and sixty-three strikes, costing the strikers $286,444.67. Adding the employers' side of the account and multiplying this single total by the number of industrial occupations in this country and you will have an annual loss to its material wealth which would be hardly exceeded if all of its principal cities were put to the torch, or if the same period had been covered by a desolating foreign war. The loss which has been incurred by the parties to the Southwest strike is a mere trifle, a mere bagatelle, compared to that incurred by the public, whose servants the carriers are, and in the enhancement of prices, the closing of factories, the loss of property, the disappointment and bankruptcy of business undertakings, and the thousand commercial and industrial ills that spread as far as the breath of the plague can spread, the total is estimated by millions and millions of money in direct and indirect losses.

By the present strike on the Southwestern system interstate commerce is throttled and a section of the country entirely isolated. The bank clearings at Saint Louis as compared to the figures before the strike were $750,000 less daily. Up to March 25 the loss in revenue to the Gould system exceeded $2,000,000 and the loss to employés $1,000,000. Two hundred and sixty million pounds of freight, valued at $40,000,000, would have moved had there been no strike. Ten flouring mills and scores of manufacturing establishments have been forced to shut down for want of raw material.

And, gentlemen, the idea is that when Mr. Gould and his employés shall differ about whether a single man shall be discharged or not the business of this whole country shall be paralyzed. The idea is that if a body of men seek recognition at the hands of capital in their organized capacity and that recognition is refused an embargo shall be immediately put upon the commerce of a whole country. Now I do not speak either in the interest of capital or in the interest of labor. There is besides these two the great body of the people, whose interests are supreme, and the cry coming from the third party is rising loud enough to be heard in this House. That third party is the public. It is the producer; it is the consumer; it is the merchant who is made bankrupt by these strikes; it is the body of men engaged in commercial enterprises which are assassinated by these strikes; it is the populous city threatened with famine in the midst of plenty; it is the peaceful community threatened with bloodshed and conflagration in the midst of peace.

Gentlemen say, "Let them fight it out." But, gentlemen, while they are fighting it out the commerce of this country is injured and destroyed. How long are they to be allowed, by culpable lack of legislation, to continue a conflict that grows worse and worse as it goes on? Capital is organizing for its own protection; labor is organizing in great masses and aggregating capital. That strife will soon become a war of subjugation; and in the mean time is the merchant to throw his means into the gulf? Is that a performance of the duty which Congress owes this country?

That is the difficulty; and I can tell you, gentlemen, that the country has gone in advance of this House and has indicated the remedy. That remedy is arbitration. Public sentiment goes before the action of this body on this question as the pillar of fire by night and of cloud by day went before the children of Israel and led them out of the land of industrial bondage. The press of this country demands arbitration. Employers and employés alike demand it. They are not asking of you voluntary arbitration, because, in the name of Heaven, they have had that for one hundred years. This measure which the Committee on Labor will place upon the statute-book, if their action is indorsed by the House, gives us no more than we have had before. It does not allay the condition at Saint Louis and in the Southwest any more than a drop of water would extinguish a conflagration.

With a view of informing myself upon this question I have been reading the reports of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, a committee which, as you know, called before it men of all classes throughout the country—employer and employé, producer and consumer; and I undertake to say that in the great mass of persons who delivered their testimony before that committee there was hardly a dissenting voice to the proposition that arbitration is the remedy, and the only remedy.

Says the Chicago Tribune of recent date:

> Has our boasted civilization really reached a point at which it is incapable of dealing with its infirmities? Has human society in this free country and this enlightened age so exhausted itself in its wonderful conquests of natural forces and its amazing achievements in the realm of physics that it has no power to grapple with its own maladies? Such a thought is inadmissible. There must be some peaceful remedy for the strife between labor and capital—some tranquil and economical method of adjusting the disputes between employers and the large bodies of employés in their service. Arbitration has been tried in many individual cases, and with gratifying success. Indeed, if the many cases settled by arbitration had not been so settled, but left to themselves, the present condition of the labor dispute would be inconceivably worse than it is. Arbitration has accomplished great good. It has done much to keep the trouble within limits, and it has pointed out a probable way for composing it entirely.
> But some well defined system of arbitration is needed. What has been done heretofore has been done through temporary make-shifts and expedients devised for individual cases. The great need is a broad, simple, easily worked system of arbitration, resting on the warrant of law, possessing official authority, and mutually acceptable to the disputant interests. Surely such a system can be devised, and it will be admitted that the disorders and disasters of the present condition are great enough to show that the sooner it is devised the better.

On this point the same editorial in the Tribune says:

> The idea with the railroads is that by forcing the general public into the fight they can subdue their employés. The Knights of Labor adopt the same reasoning, but reach the opposite conclusion. Both propose to use the necessities of the public to gain their own ends. When the parties charged with the duty of operating and keeping open the railroad highways of the country enter into combinations to close these avenues of traffic, derange business, and expose the whole American people to fearful disorder and injury, no further argument is needed to show the necessity of a compulsory settlement of all disputes between common carriers and their employés. It is time for the law to declare that neither party to such contests shall use public necessities to force a compliance with its demands by throttling the lines of communication.

Says the New York World, a leader of public sentiment, in an editorial in the issue of March 29, 1886:

It becomes more and more apparent that if any legal means can be adopted to prevent the stoppages of the transportation service which arise from disagreements between employers and employés, they should be resorted to. The interests of the immediate parties to the strikes deserve consideration of themselves, but the interests of the public also suffer, though it is entirely innocent of offense.

The business of the country forms an organized and symmetrical whole with interdependent parts built up and sustained by and adapted to the railroad system. Where that is interfered with the life-current of traffic is affected.

Wholesale establishments are closed, factories lie idle, and every one, except idlers and those engaged in mere local trade, thrown out of employment. Even the food supplies of cities are endangered. It can be seen at once that railroad strikes are very different things from those arising in business of a private character. It is simply a matter of necessity that the liability of their occurrence should be reduced to a minimum, if indeed it can not be ended altogether.

If there are insuperable difficulties standing in the way of completely effective laws, those certainly can be passed which can ameliorate the situation to a very considerable extent. The railroad companies can be reached at once through the power reserved to the State of repealing their charters. Courts of arbitration can determine what is fair and compel the companies to live up to their contracts with the public accordingly.

But if the strikers are decided to be in the wrong it would be impossible to compel them to work if they were determined not to. There are laws enoug in existence, however, to protect a company in employing new men if they can be procured, and where arbitrators had decided against the strikers public sentiment might safely be relied on to see that the laws were enforced. Let us have the best plan of arbitration that can be placed upon the statute-books. In this desire the sensible and fairly disposed representatives of capital and labor both unite, and the losses which have been sustained in Saint Louis and the vast region tributary indicate that the puplic demand for it is as imperative as it well can be.

Says Rev. R. H. Newton, in his testimony before the Labor Committee of the Senate, delivered September 18, 1883, in New York:

Arbitration has already become the substitute for strikes in England.

Says John Jarrett in his testimony before the same committee:

Arbitration is one of the most potent instruments that can be used for the purpose of settling these differences, and has worked well in other countries.

Mr. Jarrett, however, contends that arbitration reaches its highest effectiveness where trades unions are incorporated, but admits that a definite organization of the trades unions is sufficient provided its right to arbitrate be acknowledged and its recognition be compulsory, features which are covered by the substitute.

There are now legalized unions in Italy, France, Austria, and in some instances in Germany and Spain connected with councils of conciliation for members of orders established by statute. Even Mr. Gould, the arch-monopolist, says in an interview with a Tribune reporter, at a late date:

I have always been in favor of the principle of arbitration, and I now think it the best means for the adjustment of all railroad difficulties.

Mr. Gould at first refused to arbitrate the differences between himself and his employés; but upon further and better consideration on the 28th of March he agreed with Mr. Powderly to arbitrate his difficulties with the Knights of Labor upon the plan suggested by them. This plan involved the selection of three men by the employé, three men by the employer, and by them the selection of a seventh person. This is the precise plan embodied in the substitute, and had that bill been a statute at the time of the original difficulty the conclusion finally reached between Mr. Gould and Mr. Powderly would have been reached by law at first and the immense loss of the strike saved to the country.

A strike results from the failure of unorganized action. For a common interest to unite in difficulties is as natural as was the banding together of the thirteen colonies in their original strike against taxation without representation. It is the old story of the bundle of faggots which the husbandman gave his sons to break. Together they could not be broken; separated, they were easily broken. So he taught his belligerent and discordant family that "unity is strength." To go back to the original illustration, it is the maxim, "United we stand, divided we fall;" and no American should hesitate to indorse that maxim. The question of organization has always been a difficult one between employer and employé, and though capital is combined, joint stock companies, railroad pools in multiform shapes and combination, and though combinations for benevolent association, religious and professional purposes, exist the world over, and though the Christian church is but a combination for the common good, there has always been among a certain class of employers an antagonism to the combination of the workingmen in a manner similar to their own organization. The English people passed through that stage of the question, and their cruel conspiracy laws and their laws imposing penalties upon combinations of workingmen have all been abrogated. Those who seek to establish them at this day must abolish the past and refuse all history.

Says Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, whose heart has always been true when the American people were in travail, true as a touchstone to the humanity and equity of the question at issue:

When capital organizes there is no outcry; when men organize for legislation or corruption there is no outcry; but when workingmen organize men wonder what is coming.

If there be any man who should be prepared to recognize trades unions it is the man who, when asked what his politics were, said that in a Republican district he was a Republican and in a Democratic district a Democrat, but always an Erie man. Every man ought to be willing to recognize the work of his own hands; and if there be in this broad country any man who is more responsible than any or all others for the formation and the necessity of trades unions it is Jay Gould.

A great many strikes that have occurred in the United States during the last twenty years, and that are going on now, are due to the irritations caused by unrestrained railroad charges, by stolen, wrecked, and stock-watered railroad companies, by reorganizations that are robberies, by receiverships undertaking to operate railroads that are fence houses, by Black Fridays and stock-gambling panics, by the discrimination against localities, the building up and destroying of towns, the parallel lines in violation of law, and the the blind pools which the railroad companies make and break with each other for the common purpose of cheating the producer and consumer. A wide and universal protest has gone up, which has resulted in combinations against the arch-monopolist and his band, the direct fruit of which is the vast number of trades unions in this country. For my part, I indorse them; I am glad of their existence. The body-politic needs a counterpoise to the overmastering growth of monopoly, and finds it in the organized resistance thereto.

The press of the country recognizes the Typographical Union; the railroads of the country recognize the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; the iron manufacturers recognize the Amalgamated Iron and Steel Association, and many years ago the English statutes recognized the trades unions; and the incorporated guilds are as old almost as the history of the Anglo-Saxon race. From the time of the secession to the sacred mountain up to the present hour, combination has been the order of the day to resist oppression, and will be until oppression ceases to exist; that only can dissolve it. The United States to-day is honeycombed with trades unions, laboring associations, and their kindred class of combinations in the interests of labor. It may suit Jay Gould not to recognize a stone against which he stumbles and barks his shin, but the duty of statesmanship is otherwise. It recognizes every fact which is a factor in the situation. If these organizations must continue to exist, and it is impossible even if it were desirable to put them down by law, it is absolutely necessary that something should be done by Congress with a view to enabling them to secure such reasonable and ultimate objects as come fairly within the scope of their action.

At present the relation between trades unions of the country, in which name I include the Central Labor Union, the Knights of Labor, and all similar association, and the Federal law, is in a very unsatisfactory state. They include a large proportion of our best citizens and should be dealt with in a liberal spirit by the Legislature of a country whose industry is one of its principal elements of its power. The true lesson of the present situation is not to put these associations beyond the law, but, on the contrary, to bring them absolutely in the pale of justice, and make of them, instead of intangible shadows, bodies legally recognized and legally responsible. The position of the substitute for the bill in recognizing these associations may be vindicated by the experience of history and by the authority of the present day.

A number of manufacturers testified before the Senate Committee on Labor and Capital that manufacturers, as a rule, would rather treat with an association than with individuals.

Mr. A. Fink, of New York, said they could do a great deal of good in advancing the interests of workingmen and educating them to a higher standard of perfection.

Said the chairman of that committee:

Abuses, it has been seen, have been connected with the early organization and development of trades unions, but they are gradually divested of them, as in England, where things have gotten to such a pass that the government looks upon them with great favor, and so do business men.

One of the manufacturers came before that committee and testified that in Western Pennsylvania manufacturers favor trades unions. A few years ago there was a commission appointed to look into the matter in England, and it was there admitted as a result of the investigation, without any equivocation, that the trades-union system of England was a blessing to all classes.

Said William Mather, a well-known Englishman:

Well, I am happy to say that trades unions with us have become part and parcel of our life. We have accepted them now as one of the proper societies for the working classes to form, and conducted, as they are, by able and, I think, in the main conscientious and respectable men, we have joined with them rather than separated from them. Employers of labor generally have lost that violent antagonism which, you know, existed at one time; the trades unions have moderated many of their demands, and whatever demands they now make they at any rate make in more moderate language and in more polite ways. The capitalists and laboring population have both learned by experience, and I think I may say have come to see that none of the interests of capital or labor can be served when there is an antagonism between them. On the other hand, I think the labor classes see that capital has certain difficulties and trials and experiences of which laborers know nothing, and by frequently comparing ideas, as we do under the arbitration courts that are sometimes established between masters and workingmen, a great deal of information is passed from one side to the other.

The Rev. Mr. Schofield, of Manchester, Mr. Jabez Burnes, and indeed Cardinal Manning, declared at a public meeting that the unions had "done more to improve the morals of laborers than any other thing that he was aware of." The trade unions have led in England to the brilliant series of reforms which mark our century, as told so well in the articles of Mr. Howe in the Nineteenth Century for October, 1882, and Mr. Harrison in the Contemporary Review for October, 1883.

So great an authority as the Duke of Argyle, in his work, "The reign of law," states that "Combinations of workingmen for the protection of their labor are recommended alike by reason and experience."

Said Henry George, in his testimony before the Senate committee, of the trades unions:

They can accomplish something, and the larger and more extensive the combination the more they can accomplish. I regard the educational feature of these trades organizations as their most useful one.

Says a well known author:

The guilds became of such importance that their laws grew to be those of the commune or city, and to them we are largely indebted for many of the principles of the common law which have withstood both the open assaults of power, the covert stabs of codifiers, and are still the bulwark of individual right as against corporate aggression.

Says Henry Ward Beecher:

It is not my purpose to enter into any criticism of the true purposes of the workingmen's combinations, but simply to maintain that it is the effect of growing intelligence upon the condition of industrial and social life in the civilized nations of the world. I am not disturbed about this grand evolution—I will not call it revolution, for it is not; God governs all.

Trade unions are only possible where civilization exists. They can not exist in China; they can not exist in Russia; but they have been formed successfully in this country, in Germany, in France, and in Great Britain. "Labor organizations prevent pauperism and crime; they tend to make patriots of their members by urging legislation in their interests; and such legislation as tends to improve the condition of labor tends to improve the prosperity of the whole people; they help the sick, bury the dead, provide for those out of work relief and a pension for old age." They abhor strikes, except as a last resort, and their history is that as they grow strong that method of settling labor disputes passes away.

The system of co-operation, which I believe is the destined avenue of escape for this country from the dangers and difficulties involved in the unequal distribution of profits between capital and labor, is developed and made possible by the trades unions. They avow distinctly in their platform the principle of co-operation. The Central Labor Union of New York and the Knights of Labor both profess to seek its development.

A recent report of labor statistics in New Jersey states that in England, which is one of the richest countries on earth, during the panic of 1878, few, if any, of the trades unions in England suffered the evils from which so large a number suffered who were not members of the unions.

The trade and labor unions of New York and vicinity have formed a central labor union for the purpose of organization and concentration into a class for mutual protection, education, and united action in behalf of the cause of labor. They demand eight hours to constitute a day's labor, prohibition of child labor under fourteen years of age, the discontinuance of the contract system on public works, abolition of prison contract labor, payment of wages weekly in lawful money, the abolition of what is called "truck" pay; first lien for workingmen's wages; equal pay for equal work for both sexes; the establishment of bureaus of labor statistics by the Government; sanitary inspection of mines, factories, and all conditions of labor; abolition of the conspiracy law, tramp laws, and all class privileges; and that the Government shall issue all currency or money. There is nothing in this to alarm the political economist or the patriot.

The officers of the trades unions in England have a greater feeling of responsibility in advising a strike than probably any similar class of men in this country ever had. When a few years ago the miners of Cornwall, England, threatened to strike on account of a reduction of wages, the trades unions by their conservative advice and example prevented their doing so.

Mr. A. Fink, of New York, states that the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers have exercised a conservative influence in preventing strikes.

Said the Pittsburgh Sunday Critic of the Knights of Labor, speaking of the agitation which occurred in 1883:

The Knights of Labor and the Amalgamated Association have done much to establish harmony and a permanent working basis in Pittsburgh. They prevent strikes, curb unruly spirits, and fix wages in a spirit of equity.

The salutary influence and authoritative bearing of President Jarrett and his associates of the Amalgamated Iron and Steel Association in controlling the puddlers and other iron workers during the agitation of the year 1883 commanded general public approval.

Said A. Strasser, in testifying before the Labor Committee, speaking of the brass-workers' organization:

Our organization has prevented within the last three years over two hundred strikes. No strike for an increase of wages can be approved under our constitution unless by a two-thirds vote of all the unions; and if a union makes an unreasonable demand it is voted down. For instance, within three years Rochester has made three applications and they have all been voted down. And so it is with other cities.

Said B. R. Newell, of Boston:

In the Engish system of trades unions a hasty strike has become impossible. They have a board of investigation, whose duty it is, where there is trouble brewing, to visit that locality and look into the matter and, if the factors in the case will warrant, a strike is ordered. But in no case is any organization to go out foolishly and without warning of it. A strike under these circumstances would be on their own responsibility; and if they do it, they will have to do it without any assistance from the national organization.

In fact, so hedged around are these institutions with checks and limitations that it is easier for a nation to declare war against a foreign country than for any large association to enter hastily upon a strike.

There is another question involved in the present strike upon the Southwestern system, which, for the purpose of the consideration of this bill, is the most apt means of illustration: the Texas Pacific road is in the hands of a receiver, which receiver is Gould's solicitor. The question of the violation by the receiver of the previous agreement entered into by Gould is said by Gould to be solely a matter for the decision of the court controlling the receiver, yet who does not know that Gould's receiver, established for strategic purposes, would take suggestion from Gould; and that the court would do whatever the receiver asked at Gould's suggestion? Hence, while the legal fiction is plausible enough on its face it is a lie in substance, and the receivership is being used, as is usual in the United States courts, to thwart the demands of the laborer, the creditor, and the public.

This bill subjects the receiver to the arbitration process, and would thus eliminate this ground of complaint.

It is a general and universal ground of complaint among the working classes that their claim for wages is so small that they are consumed in the effort to collect them, and the large cost and the delays of the ordinary judicial system amount to a denial of justice so far as they are concerned. "The courts," says one of them pathetically and truthfully before the Senate committee, "do us no good."

In the present strike on the Southwestern system the railroad, as a club to use in the conflict, has refused to pay a dollar to any of the striking employés for services rendered before the strike began. Under the substitute bill these claims for wages could have been recovered and collected in five days. If the bill did nothing else but that, if every other clause were a dead letter, its passage would enable this committee to say that for at least one class of employés "it found law dear, and left it cheap; found it the patrimony of the rich, and left it the inheritance of the poor; found it the weapon of fraud and oppression, and left it the armor and buckler of innocence."

Under this bill the ruinous discount forced upon the employés of railroads by paying them in scrip or notes of hand of the company will be avoided; and the provision is germane to the bill, as the question of the validity of this payment would arise in any arbitration for the collection of wages.

The proposition which I have submitted in the form of a substitute for the committee's bill has been acted upon in England, acted upon successfully, and has had a great beneficial effect, both by way of settling the disputes submitted to its machinery, and by reason also of the fact that with a compulsory arbitration machinery to which they could appeal, men have been more willing to arbitrate outside of that machinery. Its effect has been to stop the system of strikes, of commercial and industrial outrages growing out of the strifes between capital and labor in that country. In the report of this committee you will find the testimony of Mr. Mather and a dozen others, going to show that this statute has been an effective method of settling those controversies. It is a misnomer, perhaps, to call it a system of arbitration. It might be more proper to denominate it a new judicial system.

The trouble is that the questions arising between labor and capital are so new, so various, so perplexing, they grow with such overmastering rapidity, and are so diverse in shape and form and meaning that no set rules of law will suffice to deal with them. It would be impossible for a body legislating all the time to keep pace with these innumerable phases of the question. Therefore it is proposed in every case of dispute to appeal simply to the justice, the equity, the humanity, the sense of right of the men selected by an impartial process to decide the question. That is what the merchants do upon their board of arbitration in Saint Louis. They settle questions involving millions of dollars by this system. These boards of arbitration, known throughout the country, have no set rules of law to govern them. So satisfactory are they that they are taking away the business of the public courts.

Take the system as applied to the Cotton Exchange in England. A man who has a dispute with a fellow-member of the exchange deposits five guineas and names his arbitrator; the other man names his; and the question is settled without suspension or appeal. Certainly a dispute between employer and employés about trivial matters could be safely intrusted to such a tribunal when questions of the title to thrones, the question of war and peace between sovereign states, and international complications such as those resulting in the Geneva award, are with confidence submitted to decision by that means.

"But," says the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], "it would be a great hardship to put a poor man in prison for disobeying an award." But what the public wants is peace; what the public wants is an end of strife; what the public wants is that the river of Lethe shall flow above these disputes and end them.

Every court of equity in the land has this power of imprisonment to-day, yet the gentleman holds up his hands at it. If the gentleman will disobey an ordinary injunction issuing out of any court in his own State to-day he will be put in jail for it.

I say to the gentleman from Georgia, if it is right to settle a dispute it is right to enforce that settlement.

Mr. HAMMOND. Does the gentleman from Missouri mean to say that he desires to establish such a tribunal that when it shall decide a dispute between a corporation and the laboring men, and decide it against the laborers, the decision shall be enforced even by calling the Army of the United States to put down the strike?

Mr. GLOVER. I said nothing about the Army of the United States.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is the legitimate way to enforce obedience, is it not?

Mr. GLOVER. That question, I think, is aside from the issue, for this reason: The gentleman was dealing with the question of imprisoning a man for not obeying an award which might be in the shape of a mandatory order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to show what the men affected by that phase of the question think, I desire to have this paper read; it shows that the laboring men will find no hardship in the enforcement of the decrees of this tribunal.

I send the paper to the desk to be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SANCTUARY EUREKA ASSEMBLY 4180, KNIGHTS OF LABOR,
Bonne Terre, Mo., March 29, 1886.

Hon. M. L. CLARDY, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned legislative committee of Eureka Assembly 4180, Knights of Labor, would respectfully ask you to present the following preamble and resolutions, adopted by this assembly, to our Senator and Representatives of this State, respectfully asking their co-operation and assistance in endeavoring to have passed the "labor-arbitration bill" presented by Congressman GLOVER on March 22, or such other bills as would avert labor strikes and similar troubles:

Whereas it has become evident to every observing man that the corporations of the country are uniting and acting in concert for the purpose of breaking down the labor organizations; and

Whereas all said organizations are the outgrowth of stern necessity forced upon them by the aggression of corporations which claim to themselves the rights which they deny to others; and

Whereas said corporations have made the non-recognition of labor organization the rock on which they propose to wreck the commerce of the country: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we insist upon our rights as American citizens to assemble and organize and to negotiate and treat with other organizations, through our delegates and representatives, with the representatives of any and all other organizations and combinations whatever.

Resolved, That the refusal on the part of the representatives of corporations to treat with the representatives of labor is a silly subterfuge for the purpose of perpetuating strife and ruining the country, which, it is becoming evident, they can no longer rule.

Resolved, That we call upon our Legislatures, both State and National, to enact such measures as will compel the recognition of labor organizations, and compel corporations to arbitrate differences between and with themselves and their employés.

By order of Eureka Assembly 4180, Knights of Labor.
LOUIS WERNER, Secretary.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman will see that the men in whose aid he invokes protection from oppression, that the Knights of Labor are in favor of any system of arbitration which will give them justice and prevent loss to the community. They do not fear it if they are to have real arbitration. When they do have that sort of arbitration they are willing to have it enforced. And they are willing to have a just system made compulsory.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. COLLINS. I notice in the proviso at the end of the first section of the bill it is provided that the arbitrators shall have no power to fix the rate of wages for the future or the hours of labor.

Mr. GLOVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLLINS. What difficulties, then, can these tribunals settle?

Mr. GLOVER. I understand the point to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers. He wants to know whether the fixing of the future rate of wages or hours of labor is excluded from the operations of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS. If they are, let me ask the gentleman what other questions are to be settled by it?

Mr. GLOVER. As to what other questions can be settled by the bill, I will say to the gentleman that if he will eliminate from the controversy between capital and labor in this country all questions but those two, then 99 per cent. of them will have been settled. I will say to the gentleman further, that this act if it had passed into law and been in operation would have prevented this strike in the Southwest system. All disputes about the construction of the previous agreement entered into at the instance of Governors Marmaduke and Martin are covered by its terms. The reason why the hours of labor and the future rate of wages are excluded from its operation is because it has been found in England that fluctuations in the conditions of trade were so great that any binding judgment enforceable for a definite length of time in the future might be unjust to one party or the other.

The question as to whether the agreement between the Knights of Labor and Mr. Gould had been broken or not might and would have been arbitrated successfully if this bill had been a law at that time, and the parties would have done one month ago (and saved to the people of our section of the country the disastrous losses they have sustained) just what they did three days ago, with this difference: They would have named one man on each side, and those two a third, instead of naming three on each side, and they the seventh. The profit on the side of the country's balance would have been millions and millions of dollars. If they are willing to settle their great disputes in that way, why not agree to let it be done by law, and so prevent the useless and ruinous conflict?

Mr. COLLINS. Is it not true nearly all the controversies between employer and employed in this country refer to fixing the rates of wages and the hours of labor?

Mr. GLOVER. No, sir; there are a vast number of questions arising out of the conditions of trade and a vast number arising out of the construction of previous agreements.

I presume that this committee at no distant day will report a bill to the House regulating the hours of labor upon interstate railroad lines, which they may as well do as the House could pass the Reagan or the Cullom bill on that subject. Enactments fixing the hours of labor at eight and ten hours are familiar the world over, and are known at the present time to several of our States. Such laws give men time to rest the body and feed the mind. Constant work grinds labor to the bone and impoverishes the soul.

What constitutes a State, Mr. Chairman? Its total power is the aggregate virtue and capacity and manhood of the individuals who compose it. For my part, whatever influence I may be able to exert upon legislation in this country shall be exerted to change unwholesome conditions under which wealth accumulates and men decay.

Such legislation would provide for one of the causes of strikes unprovided for by this bill. I presume the jurisdiction of the committee would be equally clear to legislate upon the question of wages to be paid by these corporations that is a disturbing element, and for the security of interstate commerce it should be removed. The agitation upon the subject of wages arises from the fact that labor does not receive its proper share of the profits of business. It is very evident that something is wrong, when the employé labors for 55 cents per day and can barely sustain life, while the employer piles Ossa upon Pelion in amassing his millions.

The centralization of wealth produces industrial feudalism. The captains of industry band together and still further increase the disproportion. When and where has the world ever seen such aggregations of wealth as has been constantly accumulated by the carrier taxing the producer and merchant? Vanderbilt was worth $65,000,000 in United States bonds, and over a hundred million in all. Jay Gould is worth as many millions, drawn from the profits of his railroad enterprises and speculations, while, in the midst of "overproduction," railroad employés are doomed to biting want and to struggle for the mere "leave to toil." That there is at the foundation of all this something to repair is as apparent as the sun at noonday; and that laws must pass which will provide for a more equal distribution between capital and labor of the profits of their joint production I do not hesitate to affirm.

Railroad corporations are the creatures of the State. Their profits above a reasonable per cent. are wrung from the producer and the merchant and the laborer. It is our duty, so far as they are concerned, to enforce toward the laborer justice and toward the public protection. Co-operative systems exist in over a hundred leading establishments in England. The insurance system adopted by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, whose employés do not find it necessary to strike, is an approximation thereto. In my native city some of the leading establishments have nobly taken the lead in the effort to give to the employé an interest in the profits of the business. A bill has passed both houses of the Rhole Island Legislature providing for co-operation between corporations and their employés, which might well be applied by the National Legislature to railroad corporations as a compulsory feature for all new franchises, and apply to existing corporations except in some cases where the Government may not have the reserved power to affect existing charters. I should favor such a bill under proper conditions. While the substitute would not operate upon these two questions, the hours of labor and the rate of wages, as far as interstate railroads are concerned, the way is blazed out for legislation which with this bill will completely cover the field. And tell me what other questions it would not dispose of.

Gentlemen, what the country demands on this subject is settlement of these disputes. It is more important to the country at large that these disputes should be settled than that they should be settled with mathematical justice. Perfection can not be predicated of man or his works. The jury system works many and often grievous injustices, yet it has been the chief arbitrament between man and man in the whole history of the Anglo-Saxon race. I believe this system of arbitration would work more exact justice than the jury system would in the same class of cases. But however that may be, every bill on arbitration and every scheme for courts of conciliation since the work began has subordinated such considerations to simplicity of procedure and celerity of settlement. Study them all, and you will find this to be the case. If compensation for that fact is needed, perhaps it may be found in relief from the vexatious delays of the law and its enormous expenses, and in the comprehensiveness of the remedy.

In fact, I believe the majority of the merchants of my native city would prefer to settle their differences by this simple and expeditious method rather than take the tortuous winding lane of numerous appeals, wasting costs, and perpetual new trials. In fact, their courts of arbitration of similar construction have almost ousted the State courts of control of commercial disputes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am about to close with this statement: I am satisfied a sentiment of disgust ran through the Southwest when the bill that was reported by the committee was communicated to them through the press. I am satisfied that the people of that section of the country, of all sections of the country, want this question dealt with in a straightforward and manly manner, and not by a bill which is a mere sham, which is a mere compromise, which will not save us anything but will have the effect to deceive and make the people believe a remedy is offered when in fact it can result in nothing.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] and the gentleman from New York, Mr. Gould, should know each other. At a time when commerce and labor were ready to break his iron hand and quicken his barren conscience what could be more grateful to the feelings of Mr. Gould than the genius which undertook to improve the golden opportunity by providing that public opinion shall be legalized by statute and passing a solemn act that water may run down hill so long as the laws of gravitation cause it to do so? Such a bill would pass, of course. The friends of labor hesitate to vote against it, lest their motives be misconstrued, and its enemies are only too glad to support it and so avoid serious legislation. I predict it will have every railroad vote, if such there be, in this House.

I repeat it, Mr. Gould and the gentleman from Missouri should know each other. It was the hand of the gentleman from Msssouri which drew the lightning from the cloud! It was his fine sense of humor that relieved the situation of its tragic hues and finally transformed it into pure comedy, and so made serious legislation impossible. The gentlemen should know each other better, because their efforts tend so admirably in the same direction.

But, sir, while the bill hurts nobody, while it is so absolutely innocuous that it does not even strain the relations of the gentleman from Missouri with the railroads of his district, I see nothing in it for embarrassed and ruined commerce, nothing in it for desperate and starving labor, and I shall therefore vote against it.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has not expired yet.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rose with some hesitation, thinking that to be the fact.

Mr. REAGAN. How much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from New Jersey will give me ten or twelve minutes in addition to the time yielded to me by the gentleman from Virginia it will save me from occupying an hour.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Very well.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, serious troubles have arisen between transportation companies in the Southwest and their employés, and of course much anxiety is felt by the parties immediately interested in the controversies, as well as by the people who are suffering from their effects in the settlement of this question. Indeed, the whole country looks upon this question as of great importance and magnitude. It is not unnatural that the parties interested should look to the Congress of the United States, or to the Legislatures of the States, or to any other source from which they can hope that something will be done to adjust the pending difficulties.

If Congress had under the Constitution the power to provide a remedy for the prevailing difficulty I would most heartily unite with those who invoke that remedy for the purpose of enacting it into law. But it seems to me that the effort now being made to furnish such a remedy by Congress is only introducing confusion, and that, too, of a very dangerous character.

While I recognize the fact that the committee has endeavored to do something to relieve these troubles, I fear they have not pursued the course calculated to accomplish that purpose. It is proposed in the bill reported by the committee:

That whenever differences or controversies arise between common carriers engaged in the transportation of property or passengers, whether said common carriers be private persons or corporations, between two or more States of the United States, or within the Territories of the United States, or within the District of Columbia, and the employés of said common carriers, which differences or controversies may hinder, impede, obstruct, interrupt, or affect such transportation of property or passenger, or when such employés, or any of them, allege that he or they have been treated unjustly or oppressively, either as to wages, hours of labor, or otherwise, by such common carrier, if, upon the written proposition of either party to the controversy to submit their differences to arbitration, the other party shall accept the proposition, then and in such event the common carrier is hereby authorized to select and appoint one person, and such employé or employés, as the case may be, to select and appoint another person, and the two persons thus selected and appointed to select a third person, all three of whom shall be citizens of the United States and wholly impartial and disinterested in respect to such differences or controversies; and the three persons thus selected and appointed shall be, and they are hereby, created and constituted a board of arbitration, with the duties, powers, and privileges hereinafter set forth.

This bill hinges upon that clause of the Constitution which provides that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce between the States and foreign nations and with the Indian tribes. That clause, Mr. Chairman, relates to the commerce between the States—the portion of it invoked here. This bill, it is claimed, is authorized by that clause of the Constitution. It is not a bill regulating commerce, but it is a bill in fact regulating labor contracts between parties, a portion of whom are engaged in this commerce, and for that purpose courts, or what I suppose may be considered a sort of judicial tribunal, are to be created.

Now, sir, it is going too far to assume that the commerce clause of the Constitution warrants any sort of legislation relating to all the persons and to all characters of business, if a part of those persons are engaged in the carrying of the commerce between the States. It is an assumption of jurisdiction, it seems to me, entirely unwarranted. It would take from the local tribunals the adjustment and settlement of local questions, that is to say, questions between the hirer or employer and the laborer. As well suppose that this clause of the Constitution would authorize the creation of a tribunal by Congress to settle disputes between those managing transportation lines and their merchants and grocers as to attempt to create a tribunal to settle the controversies of such persons with their employés arising out of labor contracts. This bill proposes simply arbitration, with no power to enforce an award. Under some of the bills before the House, one of those before this committee, and which has been read to be offered as a substitute, arbitration is simply an act of the arbitrators upon the subject in controversy, and which must rely finally upon the district and circuit courts of the United States and a trial de novo must be had, witnesses summoned, and all the machinery of the court called into requisition.

Under the bill of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] who has just addressed the House, the first section of the bill is amenable to the criticism upon the committee's bill, I think; that is, if my criticism upon the committee's bill is a sound one, it applies with equal force to that bill of the gentleman from Missouri which he proposes to offer as a substitute. The twenty-eighth section of the gentleman's bill is beyond all doubt plainly violative of the Constitution. I refer to the section referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], in the following words:

That it shall not be lawful for any employer, as defined in this act, to issue any scrip, bond, debenture, or promise to pay, for the purpose of paying employés, or to use the same for such purpose; and the employer, his or their officer or agent, who violates this provision of this act, shall be punished for each infringement by a fine of $500 and three months' imprisonment, or both; and the giving by the employer and receiving of the same by the employé, though intended and accepted as such, shall not operate as payment or extinguish any liability.

This applies to purely local matters, and of course this Congress can not within the purview of the Constitution take cognizance of that subject. The power of Congress as prescribed in the Constitution in Article III, section 1, had as well be examined to see what sort of courts Congress can create, or what sort of tribunals, under the Constitution, can be established. This article provides:

SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

This bill does not provide for a court such as is provided for under this provision of the Constitution, nor for an officer to be appointed by the President, or by the judges, or by any other authority which is recognized by the Constitution as competent to make such appointment.

The second section of this article provides:

The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects.

In all this enumeration there is no power given to provide a tribunal to try such cases as are contemplated by this bill. There is an absence of authority. It does not come within the jurisdiction intended by the Constitution to be given to courts of the United States, and it comes under no other provisions of the Constitution. The appointments for all the officers are to be made by the President, or by the courts, or by the heads of Departments. There is no provision here for creating a tribunal whose officers are appointed by the President, or by the courts, or by the heads of Departments. There is no power given under the Constitution for a Federal court, for a Federal jurisdiction, to try the class of cases contemplated by this section.

While my sympathies—I need hardly say to this House—are profoundly enlisted on behalf of those who toil for their living, while I wish to see justice and a full measure of justice done to them, I do not wish to see the attempt to secure justice to them made in such a way as to break down the barriers of the Constitution, the best charter of our liberties, the best protection of our rights, whether as citizens or as members of an incorporated company, and of all others the common people have the greatest interest in the preservation of the Constitution in its pristine vigor. It is the barrier between them and despotism or anarch. We should never forget that our people have the mission devolved upon them of convincing the world that man is capable of self-government, and not only capable of self-government, but of creating a constitutional government with proper limitations upon its power, and of preserving the Constitution and enforcing its limitations, so that liberty regulated by law shall be the right and heritage of the American citizen. And whenever we give our consent to obey the impulses of the moment, the passions of the hour, and do things not warranted by the Constitution, we are striking at the very foundation of our political system and infusing into it the elements of confusion, misfortune, and sorrow. So that no higher thing can be done by a member of Congress than his taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. If we would do that, we must look to it for the authority for our action. We find no authority, as it seems to me, in the Constitution for the passage of the bill before us. But while we find no authority there, we are not left by our system without a remedy. The wisdom of our fathers did not leave the American people without the fullest remedy for every grievance with which man may be afflicted.

The powers of Congress are delegated. It possesses only delegated powers; and by the tenth amendment of the Constitution all powers not expressly given to the United States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. And even our States, for whose benefit the reservation of the power for all local subjects is made, do not possess unlimited power even for local matters.

Under our system of Government, supported by the wisdom of those who framed and gave it to us, there are certain powers inherent in the people that no government, either Federal or State, can exercise or can take from the people. The rights secured to our ancestors by Magna Charta are enlarged to us by our Federal and State constitutions, and every guarantee of personal liberty, of freedom of conscience, and of every inherent right which we can claim is preserved to us against the power of any government on earth; and we may as well recognize this.

The States, as was said by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] a few moments ago, are possessed of a power to deal with all legal questions between man and man, all questions of contract and of personal right. In all those public matters where Congress has not power to act, the power of the States to act upon them is reserved to them. They have their local governments, their governors, their judges, their ministerial officers, their Legislatures to enact laws, their courts to enforce them, with the power, if they see proper, to create courts of arbitration, as most of the States have already done. Courts of arbitration now exist in the States of Texas and Missouri, and I have no doubt in the States of Arkansas and Kansas, the States in which these troubles exist, with all the machinery provided, and open to all parties desiring to have legal controversies arbitrated, and I suppose nothing further in this respect is necessary.

The questions which now trouble the people of the Southwest are not questions in the ordinary sense which courts determine. It is a controversy over a claim that a previous adjustment between the parties had been violated and that there was a refusal by the corporations to abide by it. That is one side of the controversy. The corporations object and say the fault grew out of the action of their employés. With the precise condition of facts I am not familiar and shall not undertake to say what they are. It is enough that we recognize that they have a controversy—not about a debt which one owes to the other, not about a contract which could be enforced in a court of law or equity, but about the terms on which they are to be associated together and how the profits of the enterprise in which they are engaged are to be divided between the capital employed and the people whose labor makes that capital effective. It is rather a political than a legal question. And how are you to arbitrate it? Of course, the parties by their own consent can agree to an adjustment, and they are now trying by consent to secure an adjustment between themselves, and it is greatly to be hoped this may be effected to-day or that it will be very soon.

I know that the men who labor feel very often that they are wronged and oppressed without a remedy. I think that is frequently the case. The officials of railroad corporations have a wonderful conception of their own importance and dignity, and I have no doubt that one of the best ways of getting a true comprehension of the awfulness of the day of judgment would be to go before a petty officer of some great railroad company and ask to have something done. The dignity, the authority, the pride, the grandeur with which such a man can refuse to do the most reasonable thing, is amazing. Feeling that he is protected by a great corporation beyond the reach of law, such men seem to take pride in their insolence and their insults, not only to the employés under them but to the general public. But I do not know how that is to be reached by arbitration or by law. If the contempt of mankind will not cure it, I fear it is a disease of a hopeless character. I would not be understood as saying this is the case with all the subordinate railroad employés. As the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] said a while ago, the remedy for these evils lies very far back of what we are trying to deal with here.

The remedy, in my judgment, is to be found through the ballot-box, by the election of legislators of States and governors of States and members of Congress and Presidents who will respect the rights of the people and will stop the general system of robbery of the great mass of the people for the benefit of the few that has been going on during the last twenty years. I know, sir, that it is very unfashionable to speak in this way, but I feel that I have some right to speak for the people, because I come from the class who toil for a living. I know what it is to be an employé and poor, but I know too, sir, that the dignity of manhood should rest upon every American citizen; the rights of his manhood should be respected; and, until you control these great corporations by law, until you stop the robbery of a protective tariff and the monopoly of the national banks, and diffuse the blessings of this country all over it instead of continuing the accumulation of capital in a few hands to the impoverishment of the great masses, you will never find a remedy for these evils.

Sir, I can remember, and there are others here old enough to remember, when every American citizen was proud of every foot of land within our territory; I can remember when we were proud of our general musters, proud of the Fourth of July, proud of our general prosperity, proud of our military and naval achievements, proud of the personal integrity and manhood of our people. Every citizen then felt a patriotic pride in the welfare of every other citizen. Then we had the freest and happiest, most glorious country that the sun of heaven ever shone upon. How is it now? Do these feelings pervade and permeate society as they once did? Or is it not true that we are engaged in a struggle for money-getting, controlled by avarice, greed, and fraud; a struggle in which the best interests and the dearest rights of the great body of the people are sacrificed in order to accumulate millions in the hands of individuals and corporations?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Nothing was ever truer than that.

Mr. REAGAN. And, Mr. Chairman, does not history tell us that whenever the wealth of any nation becomes concentrated in the hands of the few, the people become slaves and the owners of the money their masters? Sir, in 1877, when strikes occurred, which we all regretted, the first impulse was to appeal to the Federal Government, the next was to enlarge the standing Army, in order that it might be used as a police force to answer the complaints and murmurings of the people by shot and shell.

I am afraid that the same feeling exists to-day, a feeling that the people complain without cause. Mr. Chairman, that is a mistake. Let them have prosperity, let them have their rights respected. It is natural for all men to love peace, to cling to their families, to endeavor to make their homes happy, and if you give them reasonable means of doing that, you will find a peaceful, contented, happy people. Sir, the great problem before this country is to determine whether it is in the power of Congress, or rather whether it is the will of Congress, to provide that the evils I have referred to shall be corrected, or whether they are to go on until we have a few millionaires and millions of paupers, and until our Federal system of government shall have been destroyed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise for the purpose of limiting general debate.

Several MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Before the motion is put I desire to ask the gentleman a question, as his answer may determine the votes of some of us. What limit do you propose to put upon this debate?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I propose to limit general debate, and then to let the bill be discussed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. But you propose to limit the debate to what time?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. To the shortest possible time.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. What time? State the time. We do not want this indefinite talk; we want to know what you intend to do.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Let the House fix the time.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Well, then, we will vote down this proposition.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The House will fix the limit of debate when we rise. I do not fix it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, that the committee rise, there were—ayes 79, noes 77.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, and Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, were appointed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the motion will be withdrawn.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not desire to waste time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to occupy time in the discussion of the general subject which has given rise to this bill. It is already well understood by this House and by the country at large. But I wish more particularly to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the character of the provisions of the bill reported by the Committee on Labor and to some of the features of the proposed substitutes. First of all, I wish to express my belief that when the honorable and distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] spoke of the bill as being "a trick on the credulity of the workingman" and "a fraud" he did not use his words with due consideration. I do not believe that he or any other member of this House will do the committee the injustice of supposing for a moment that they would report a bill for action in this House that was either in fact or in their judgment a "fraud" or "a trick upon the credulity" of any workingman. I know that the "milk of human kindness" is so characteristic of the gentleman that he would not advisedly use an expression which could be tortured into conveying such a meaning.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will pardon me for one minute——

Mr. BUCHANAN. If I yield to the gentleman I take somebody else's time; that is the trouble.

Mr. KELLEY. I wanted to vindicate the use of my language.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman will undoubtedly have ample time further on in this discussion. The fact that he announced that he would vote for it shows that he does not regard it as a fraud or a trick.

This measure is the outcome of a number of different propositions introduced into this House and referred to the Committee on Labor. It is the result of serious consideration and of careful thought. The committee, when they undertook to deal with this question, found that there were difficulties in the way which do not become apparent until the question is subjected to careful consideration. They have reported a bill upon which they are practically united. They have tried to do their best. They do not believe that the wisdom of Solomon is incarnated in their persons, but they believe that in formulating their work they have at least as honest and as patriotic motives and as high a regard for the best interests of the laboring sections of this country as any gentleman on this floor can have.

It may be that the measure is crude. If so, let discussion develop the crudities, and let those who find deficiencies come forward with their propositions for amendment. In this matter I have no pride of authorship. I did not draw this bill; and although a member of the subcommittee that framed it, I was prevented by illness from meeting with the committee, and have not formulated any part of the bill. I believe it to be the desire of every member of the committee that this bill shall be made as perfect as the wisdom of this House can make it; and every amendment that will tend to improve the bill will be welcomed by us. Can more be asked? Notice has already been given of one amendment by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN]. I may say that I am inclined to regard it favorably. Notice of another has been given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM]. When clothed in legal language—I mean such language as will stand the test of the courts—there will be, it seems to me, a substantial merit in his proposition. So, as I say, from whatever source these amendments may come, if they tend to perfect this bill, I for one, as a member of that committee, will welcome them.

I want to say at the outset that personally I am in favor of going farther than this bill goes, but not on the line upon which this bill proceeds. The people of this country require certain things to be done; they require themselves or their goods to be transported from place to place; they can not well carry on this transportation business in their individual capacity; and so, out of their sovereign power, they grant charters to aggregations of individuals, to wit, corporations, to perform this service. They give to these corporations the right to take property by eminent domain; they grant to them great and unusual powers. These powers are granted for the purpose of carrying out certain objects for which they, as corporations, are created. The carrying out of those objects is the only reason moving the sovereignty to make the grant.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold it to be self-evident that when these corporations no longer fulfill the functions of their creation the sovereign power can step in and with its authoritative language say, "If you do not perform these functions the sovereign power will resume the power granted you and carry out these functions." It may seem at first startling; but why may not such a power be exercised? You may say that these corporations may be, through no fault of theirs, precluded from carrying out the objects of their creation, and thus excused. I deny it. The only acts that excuse are the acts of God and the public enemy. When men refuse to longer work for the wages that are given them, simply refuse to work, and therefore the trains lie idle, is that the act of the public enemy or of God? I say neither.

When disturbances arise and the trains are prevented by physical force and violence from being put in motion, then the police power of each State is at hand ready to be called into action, and for that abundant law already exists. But however this may be, whether or not it be in the power of the sovereignty which granted these corporate powers to resume them when they are no longer used for the benefit of the community, it is perhaps useless at present to discuss, because that remedy is not provided for in this bill. The committee were not prepared without time for further thought to adopt my suggestion.

I allude to it simply to illustrate my remark when I say that I do not believe this bill goes as far as it ought, and to indicate the line in which in my judgment further legislation, if needed, must be had. During the freight-handlers' strike in New York, we were told by these corporations that they could not exercise their powers, that they were without remedy; but when the courts of New York with their mandamus proceedings took hold of the matter and adjudged against those corporations, they found a way out of their difficulty. So I say when the sovereign power determines to take back to itself that which it has granted, these corporations will find a way out of the difficulty. Of course, it is conceded that this remedy could only be applied in the cases of corporations within our reach. As to others, State action would need to be superadded.

Objections are made to this bill. We are told it will be expensive. Why, sir, as I understand the Statutes of the United States of America, if we enact this bill into law these arbitrators will receive the munificent sum of $5 a day each during the time they are actually employed. There is more money wasted on superfluous employés of this House in one month, I undertake to say, than would be needed to pay all expenses under this bill for a year.

But they are to have stenographers and a clerk! A careful reading of the bill will show these officials are only to be employed when needed during the continuance of the particular investigation. These are not perpetual, permanent officers; they are simply for the occasion.

Why should not the trifling expenses of an inquiry into the right and wrong of employer and employé be paid from the public Treasury? Labor is dissatisfied; it drops its work and says it can no longer exist at the rates paid, and arbitration is ordered. Shall labor out of its poor pittance pay the cost of that arbitration, or shall the people of this country, for whose benefit, after all, the investigation is ordered that again the wheels of commerce may turn, pay the insignificant sum expended in securing the investigation and conducting it? Labor can not pay it. If the corporation must, that might become another motive against its agreeing to the arbitration.

But we are told that the bill is unconstitutional. The Constitution seems to be a handy thing to have around when corporations are to be created, and to be terribly in the way when legislation is asked securing justice and fair dealing between such corporations and their employés. I wish I could have better heard the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], who spoke unfortunately so low I was unable to catch more than here and there a word. From what I did hear, I judged his objection to the constitutionality of the bill was founded upon the fact that it deals with certain matters arising out of contracts between employers and employés, and not with the broad question of interstate commerce. But these matters are, unquestionably, incidents of interstate commerce. They are among the minor facts which, aggregated, make the great fact of interstate commerce. In the interests of the measure he has advocated here for years regulating such commerce by Congress, he ought not to draw faint distinctions.

If this bill provided for enforced arbitration, then the objection might possibly merit a serious examination. But it does not so provide. It simply, when two parties agree to arbitrate their differences—the one party being by the terms of the bill a "common carrier engaged in the transportation of property or passengers * * * between two or more States of the United States, or within the Territories of the United States, or within the District of Columbia," and the other "the employés" of such carrier—provides the machinery which said parties may use in effecting such arbitration. Is it constitutional for Congress to regulate interstate commerce and unconstitutional for Congress to provide a possible remedy against the stoppage of such commerce? Is there anything in the Constitution which prevents the Congress of the United States from saying that when two parties thus engaged agree to do a thing that is itself legal, that harms no one, they shall have the power to do it, and from providing the appliances they may need to make effectual their agreement?

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question: if at common law they can not arbitrate, and whether that arbitration is not binding? If they arbitrate is it not final, and can not it be enforced in the courts of this country?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman puts three questions into one. As to the first I will say yes; and as to the second and third I will say no.

Mr. HOPKINS. Tell me why. What do you regard as the second and third questions to which you say no?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I answered in the order in which you put them. I say at common law two parties can arbitrate. I say without some provision of statute law on the subject that arbitration is not binding, nor is it final or capable of enforcement in any court. If there be a statute superadded to the common law then the provisions of that statute bind so far as they may go but no further.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does this bill provide if there be arbitration how that arbitration shall be enforced?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I propose to make my speech by the stages I have indicated on my notes, and I can not be diverted, with all courtesy to the gentleman, from the order of the performance. I will answer the gentleman before I am through, I think.

Now we come to the difficulty which underlies this whole question of arbitration. It was raised in the objection of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND]. I do not pretend to quote his exact words, but his proposition is that you can not provide an arbitration to compel a corporation to "do its duty toward its employés without also compelling the employés to do their duty to the corporation." That, I think, is the exact spirit, if not the very words, of the gentleman's objection. In other words, if you can compel a corporation to employ you can also compel the employé to work. If you can compel the one to pay a higher wage you can compel the other to accept a lower wage. If you can imprison the one for refusal you may the latter for like refusal. Is that objection sound?

The difficulty with many of the propositions brought before the committee was this, that while they were well intended, while they were meant for the benefit of labor in this country, they were veritable boomerangs. Why, I read in the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER], in section 19, after an arbitration has been had and an award has been made, these words:

> And in a case for mandamus or injunction the court may issue the same and punish disobedience thereof by proceedings for contempt in the usual form.

And in another bill now pending in this House, introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], it is provided in section 4 that where an award is made and either party disobeys it—I quote now literally—"the same shall be held to be a contempt of court, to be punished by fine and imprisonment, or either or both, in such amount or for such term as the court may see fit."

What is the result possible under these bills? Let us see. Difficulty arises. John Smith, representing some order of men seeking redress, and Jay Gould, we will say, representing the corporation, agree to an arbitration. The award, as may happen, is made against the order. After the facts are found the men are adjudged in the wrong. Either the words of that section are meaningless or the men of the order can be imprisoned, not for a day, not for a year, but at the pleasure of the judge of a United States court for contempt in disobeying. Disobeying what? Suppose the difficulty arose out of an alleged insufficiency of wages. The men say they will not work longer at the price paid. It is submitted to arbitration. The arbitrators are of opinion that the price is sufficient, and the court says on that finding you must work at this rate of wages. The order say they will not. I say that either that provision is without meaning or the court can imprison those men, free American citizens, for still refusing to work at a compensation which they know is not sufficient to supply the actual necessities of their families.

I therefore repeat that these proposed substitutes are boomerangs, and I will not stand in my place in this House and vote for measures which make such results possible.

But another provision to make the award binding is found in one of these proposed substitutes. It provides that if the award is not lived up to there shall be an execution and sale of property of the one not obeying the award. Mr. Chairman, in connection with something I read the other day these words have to my mind a terrible significance. I hold in my hand what purports to be the report of an interview with Mr. Jay Gould on Saturday or Sunday last, and which is undoubtedly authentic as it bears the marks of careful revision, and was undoubtedly intended for publication. In the course of his remarks I find these words:

> We purpose to recover damages from every member of the association who has any property.

I will send the article to the Clerk's desk, to be read for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

> We purpose to recover damages from every member of the association who has any property. A great many employés of the Missouri Pacific, especially machinists and engineers, have homes which they have bought out of their savings. Some of the men are worth $15,000 or $20,000 apiece. They are responsible to us for the losses we have suffered, if they belong to the Knights of Labor.

Now, out of the wages which he allows to his employés some have been enabled by lives of frugality and sobriety to purchase little homes of their own. What does he propose to do? He proposes to hold the men responsible as conspirators and compel these homes which they have so acquired to shelter their defenseless families to be sold and their value go to swell the millions in his surcharged coffers. What else does he mean when he insists that in any arbitration the damages alleged to have been suffered by his companies must be taken into account? The losses, especially by the non-use of the roads, are undoubtedly heavy. Shall we pass an enforced arbitration bill, such as this substitute, by which he could have this matter submitted, and expose these little homesteads to the chances of seizure and sale under an unfriendly award?

I am opposed to any bill under which it is possible for him to do that and do it under the forms of law. I do not say that was the intention of the framers of the proposed substitute, for, from my knowledge of them, I believe it was farthest from their thoughts; but I do say that under the wording of that substitute such a proceeding is rendered possible. We must accept or reject bills, not because of the motives of their framers, but because of what such bills, in fact, may be capable of being used for.

Mr. RYAN. What substitute does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER].

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, if we pass any arbitration bill, that arbitration must be either voluntary arbitration or enforced arbitration. The committee have decided in favor of voluntary arbitration and against enforced arbitration, because if enforced arbitration is provided it may, in the hands of designing men, be used to the detriment, ay, gross injury of the laboring classes of this country. They have no heavy treasury to fall back upon. They are not provided with able counsel, and in any contest before any forum must always be at a disadvantage. Enforced arbitration to be effective must be followed by an enforced award, and an enforced award means not only possible but probable danger to the employé. There is the whole situation in a nutshell, and volumes of description could not make it plainer.

The bill is effective so far as the committee believe that under the present state of things it is safe to go in the direction of arbitration. When the spirit of the times shall have changed; when these corporations shall have become the servants of the people and the people shall again have become the masters; when we shall have gotten back to the old-time idea that these corporations were created for the purpose of serving the needs of the public, and not to enable a few men by their misuse to accumulate the wealth of Crœsus or Dives, we may go further, but at present we did not deem it safe to devise any more radical measure, at least, upon this line.

The provisions of the bill are plain, simple, and direct. They are so plain that they can not be misunderstood. The parties desire to arbitrate; they are allowed to do so; the arbitrators are clothed with powers which under the common law they do not have. They are given the power to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses under oath, and so to get at the real facts underlying the matters in dispute—all of it power which at common law they would not have. They make the award, and it is filed, together with all the testimony, in the office of the Commissioner of Labor of the United States, to there be and remain a public record forever.

If we go further than that upon this line we then enter upon legistion which, as I have said, may be disastrous to the very interests which, being the weaker and least protected, should receive our special care, or at least cause us to exercise caution in formulating any law.

Having completed the above remarks,

Mr. BUCHANAN inquired how much of his time remained.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining. The gentleman has spoken for thirty minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But I had an hour and eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand that, but I have an arrangement by which I am to get that time back with interest and compound interest.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will state to the House that when the gentleman from New Jersey courteously yielded a portion of his time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] I yielded him eighteen minutes of my time. He can have that now if he desires it, or he can have the eighteen minutes later.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire them now. I yield ten minutes to my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

Mr. MCADOO. The American industrial people are probably, take them all in all, the most intelligent on the face of the earth. They are a reading and thinking people, acute, intelligent, and quick to form opinions. And let no gentleman on the floor of the House delude himself with the idea that they can be deceived by mere specious promises, rounded platitudes, and airy nothings. We should treat such intelligence and such a great mass of intelligent labor with honest and with candid dealing. To such a constituency we can appeal with safety if we appeal with truth.

Our fathers started in to solve what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] designates as the great problem of the ages, and they made the first step toward it on this continent by striking down the strongest, most imperial, tyrannous, and resplendent paternal government that had ever been erected. What was it that for eight long and bloody years they maintained that heroic and unequal struggle? It was to put down a system of government that bound the land, which is the entire wealth of a nation, in the chains of feudalism; that absorbed the indvidual right in the magnificent and all-prevailing power of the state, making the state pre-eminently everything and the individual man insignificant or nothing, a pawn for kings, an automaton in the hands of lords. Sir, it was to be hoped that after this unparalleled sacrifice, this freedom-loving and heroic endeavor, there would never be erected on American soil a worse, a bastard, an irresponsible paternal government.

But, unfortunately from the amassing of wealth in the great commercial centers, the successful accumulation of great tracts of land, the individual absorption of the wealth created by industry, there have arisen—true not yet fully developed, but still dangerous enough to be repressed by legislation—the symptoms of paternal government in the powerful monopolies, corporations, money-kings, and princely bondholders which oppress and grind labor and threaten the existence of republican institutions. Sir, the direst of all evils, whether it be by one or many, is paternal government. It represses ambition, crushes industry, begets dependence, is the climax of tyranny, degrades manhood, destroys liberty, and is only compatible with galling oppression and abject slavery. The free, intelligent, ambitious, patriotic, and liberty-loving American workingman will not long suffer it to exist, but will destroy it with the ballot.

The idea of our fathers was this: That instead of paternal government, that was to regulate the individual action, to control the people, to repress individuality and manhood, the Government was to be simply an umpire, to see that the contest for existence, for the acquisition of property, for ambitious advancement, should be an absolutely fair one. And, sir, I think that this idea was violated when one or two years back we saw a number of our artisans and clerks who had combined to shorten the number of hours of work in the city of Newark, N. J., taken and put in jail for this peaceable agitation, while across the river in the great city of New York half a dozen men sat down to say by their individual fiat what should be the price of flour, what should be the rate of transportation from Chicago, and what should be the wages of labor per day of these men who are now striking on the Missouri Pacific. I ask if labor was not compelled to combine by the example of capital openly confederating and controlling railroads and holding open public meetings to fix the price of provisions and regulate the wages of their employés? There was nothing left for the honest manhood, industry, and labor of the United States under those circumstances but to combine in this colossal organization which now confronts Congress and the country. Sir, this orderly, peaceful, intelligent organization of labor is unequalled in any country. Let us pray that it may be wisely, patriotically, and efficiently guided in its counsels. It is indeed fortunate thus far in the ability and wisdom of its leading directors.

My time is limited; if it were not, I would like to deal more at large with these great questions. I want to say another thing. The remedy lies with the people themselves. You can not cure this great disease, this antagonism between capital and labor, by any crude hasty-poultice panacea of legislation. Why, Mr. Chairman, when Napoleon, who was as much the deliverer of Europe as he was its conqueror, or when with his powerful and resplendent genius he struck down hereditary aristocracy, dynasties, thrones, kings, caste, condition, and class, and preached with sword and fire to the enslaved peoples of Europe equality and fraternity, he was unable to do anything beyond freeing the people and leaving them to themselves, that by their own growing intelligence and patriotism they might work out their own salvation. Free the people, and they will solve these problems to their best interest. The remedy lies with the people and with public opinion, the most powerful engine and leverage of modern times, and more especially in our country. No giant here yet can fight it successfully. What is this bill? It is merely a first simple step, and as such praiseworthy. It is a bill to give vent to public opinion in an orderly, legal way; to legalize this tremendous enginery, to solidify, to materialize the public opinion of sixty millions of intelligent people, to focus that powerful influence upon corporations, upon monopolies, upon these great railroads that cross our States, so that they may feel compelled in their own interest to do justice to those whom they employ.

For myself I will vote for this bill. At least it serves notice on injustice that justice is awake. This arbitration will show the right and the wrong of a great strike. It will lighten dark places. Government will umpire the contest, and see, let us hope, fair play, and, so doing, instruct us all as to the merits of this struggle, besides showing these great corporations that Government does not desert the poor and needy for the rich and powerful, and that the people, not the few, are to rule for all future time here in all parts of North America.

Sir, there are other measures beyond this in which the industrial people of the United States are interested. The greatest of all questions is the land question. No people ever yet were free who were not a nation of freeholders, and I view with great alarm and indignation an alien Anglo-Irish landlord in the State of Illinois, one Scully, a man who refuses allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, and who, as some of the ablest writers of the day tell us, has upon his land in that great State one-third as many tenants as there are in Scotland. Yes; and Illinois, a comparatively new State, has, with less population, nearly 20,000 more tenant farmers than there are in the ancient feudal kingdom of Scotland.

How this fortunate Irish landlord Scully must smile when he hears our Fourth of July orations! As he rolls along the boulevards of Paris on the fruits of the toil, pain, and frugality of his Illinois tenants he is probably grateful enough to admit that we are certainly the most indifferent and tolerant people on the globe. Verily Illinois is better than Kerry or Donegal in Ireland, for Illinois has no land agitators who have as yet broken in on the pleasant dream of happy Scully.

Sir, one Scully is a danger-signal; but when the army of Scullys, transported landlords, greedy speculators, and nomadic counts, knights, dukes, and lords, have already possessed themselves of 30,000,000 acres of American soil it is high time for Congress and the State Legislatures to cry halt to this invasion of alien enemies of our institutions. The immortal Jefferson went on record in his day against this alien proprietorship in American land. And one of the ablest writers of our Revolutionary period, in a work dedicated to Benjamin Franklin, says in 1787 of the necessity of maintaining our own citizens on the land:

A general and tolerably equal distribution of landed property is the whole basis of national freedom. The system of the great Montesquieu will ever be erroneous till the words property or lands in fee-simple are substituted for virtue. Virtue, patriotism, or love of country never was and never will be till men's natures are changed a fixed, permanent principle and support of government. But in an agricultural country a general possession of land in fee-simple may be rendered perpetual; and the inequalities introduced by commerce are too fluctuating to endanger government. An equality of property, with a necessity of alienation constantly operating to destroy combination of powerful families, is the very soul of a republic. While this continues, the people will inevitably possess both power and freedom; when this is lost, power departs, liberty expires, and a commonwealth will inevitably assume some other form.

"Power departs, liberty expires!" Is not this the voice of a prophet from beside the cradle of the Republic, ringing in our deadened ears in these days of the Scullys, the speculators, the courts, the railroads, and the colossal farms?

"Power departs, liberty expires" under the colossal shadow of the great public grants, the foreign and domestic land syndicates, grabbers, and stealers, cattle kings, "dummy" entry-men, 4,000,000-acre owners, as in one California case, and 2,000,000 acres in the case of a Florida owner!

Looking at these facts the statesman and the thinker can not but be appalled at the horrible suggestion that may be, when dying landlordism has been extirpated by popular uprisings from Europe, this dreadful nightshade may successfully plant its seeds in our as yet comparatively free soil. Sir, I am no alarmist, but I say from the fullness of conviction that if these enemies of the human race, these usurping lords against natural rights and natural freedom, plant themselves firmly on American land, naught save the raging storm of agitation, or, worse still, the violence of revolution, will uproot and overturn them. Labor and land, land and labor, these are centennial problems. The one is with us, the other comes on apace, and may even reach us before that day, big with fate, when the last acre of the public domain has been inclosed and the landless state will contemplate these new barons of North America.

Now, sir, as I have already said, no people on the earth ever yet did, or ever will, maintain themselves as freemen unless they live on free land; and if there is one evil more than another against which the organized intelligent labor of the United States is calling for relief it is land monopoly. If there is one thing they desire more than another, it is that this Congress shall prevent, by legislation, the absorption of over 30,000,000 acres of the public domain, of the state's land, by men who at heart are the enemies of free government and of the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

I here insert as part of my remarks the following on this subject from a recent number of the North American Review:

Thus from the day—now officially declared to be at hand—that the public domain is quite exhausted, the manufacture of a tenant-farming class will go on in the United States at an enormous rate. "We let most of our land in certain districts to tenants," said a Chicago land agent to me, "because by that means, with the rents we get, we are often able to return the original price of the land twice over in three years. We have 60,000 acres now let to tenants. But we don't keep it up; landlording needs supervision, and we do business on too extensive a scale to go in for it as a regular thing. It enables us to hold our land out of market until we get a fancy price for it. But many of the men we sell to keep on the tenants, only retaining one farm to work themselves. It pays better." In fact, even now—before the public domain is yet altogether a tradition—tenant-farmers are being manufactured in the Western States by wholesale.

Settlers have no other resource, and men who own land find it a vastly better investment to let it to tenants than to work it themselves. They can get a preposterous rent—half the crop is a usual rent—and thus make a round income without working for it, having their time to devote to other pursuits or to idleness, while their principal, the land, is sustaining its great increment in value from the labor of the tenant and of the other tenants around who go to make the neighborhood a settled community. It is a fact that there can not be a moment's doubt about—the tendency of landlordism in the United States is inevitable and immense. Even the owner of 160 acres will by and by, when land becomes still scarcer, find it more easy and enjoyable and far more profitable to break his lot up into small tenant holdings, retaining only a few acres of kitchen garden for his private use. This conclusion, which is really palpable, can be submitted to a satisfactory statistical test. I have made up from the census, in groups, the distribution of the tenant farmers over the various States.

This table throws a remarkable light on the progress of American landlordism. What we look for first is neither a very old nor far Eastern or Southern State, nor a very new nor far Western State, but a State that in its growth has been subjected to the more or less modern conditions, and that has got beyond the transition stage, through which the newer States are now passing. Such a State will be found in the northern central group, and it will be allowed without cavil that the most typical State of that group is Illinois. What do we find? That Illinois has gone deeper into the landlord and tenant system than any State of the entire Union? And if we look through the other States of the same group, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Kansas, Missouri, and even a State so new and so far west as Iowa, we behold a state of things equally astonishing. In less than ten years' time States like Minnesota and Nebraska—which already possess a substantial tenant class—will have as many tenants and landlords as any of the others.

Looking now in another direction we see that with the exception of New York and Pennsylvania, the older Eastern States have not gone in for tenant-farming to anything like the same extent as the settled mid-Western States; and this, of course, is because they were settled up at a time when good free land was in fact—not in fancy—both plentiful and handy. The old plantation States of the South may stand out of our argument, as it may be urged that they had no alternative after the war but to transform the slaves on the plantations into tenants. Following is the table:

States and Territories.	Number of tenant farms.	States and Territories.	Number of tenant farms.

A study of landlordism in some of the States where it most flourishes has revealed many remarkable things which can not be referred to on this occasion. It may be remarked, however, that landlordism in States like Illinois is already taking on many of the features that distinguish it in the Old World. The crude nucleus of a landed aristocracy is being surely formed. In Springfield at present there dwells some two hundred landlords who live upon the rent-roll of properties in the middle of the State. Many of them were originally working farmers who, having the eye for land—what a French writer calls the convoitise des champs—managed to gradually patch together a considerable estate, and, having leased it to tenants, have come to the State capital to live at their ease.

The children of many of them are now picking up the airs of the great world in Paris and London. One landlord whose estate I visited owns 40,000 acres in one county alone, and this is less than half of his entire property. From these 40,000 acres he derives a rental in cash of considerably more than $100,000 a year. He is not an American citizen, but an Irishman who has earned an unpleasant notoriety as a landlord in his own country. He lives in England, leaving his estates here to be managed by an agent, and contenting himself with a flying visit to this country once in every four years or so. He does not even pay taxes to the country from which he draws his princely income. In his leases, one of which I possess, it is stipulated that the tenants shall pay yearly to the landlord "the full amount of all taxes or assessments, general or special, of every kind or nature whatsoever, made, levied, or assessed upon or against" the land they hold from him. He must find a most enjoyable difference between landlording in Illinois and landlording in Ireland; for in Ireland the land law is now framed with some view to the protection of the tenant, and the tenant's representatives in Parliament have had some hand in the making of it; whereas the land law of Illinois is made altogether for the landlords and by the landlords, without a single one of its thirty-odd clauses that can be construed as other than a device to secure that the tenant shall bleed to the full nomination of his bond.

VI.

The soil of a country is like the blood: Once it is badly vitiated it seems impossible ever to cleanse it, and the poison keeps constantly breaking out. It was thus with Rome, whose public domain, though continually increased by conquest, was helpless to protect the republic from the consequences of early improvidence. Periods of distress, agitations, struggles between rich and poor, land laws made under terror of the fire-brand in the hands of hunger, are the phenomena which, like ulcers on the human body, mark the progress of agrarian disease throughout the course of Roman history. No remedy could succeed in stemming it. Though every agrarian law had for its object to establish the poor on small holdings on the public domain, and to break up the illegal monopolies of the rich, yet Rome ever failed to establish her peasant proprietors or to shake off the grip that monopoly was once allowed to fasten on her vitals. The men of money evaded law after law, bought up officials, ruined the agitators, and the poor men worked their bonanza estates for them as tenants or as serfs, or came into the city to swell the vote-selling mobs of the purlieus. Feudalism, landlordism, usury, slavery, spread their humors over Rome's fair body. The ulcers became cancers, and the disease, so thoughtlessly admitted into the system, became the disease the patient died of in the end. "Latifundia perdidere Italiam," wrote the historian with the scientific precision of a physician closing the entry of an interesting case. Does America, that looks to no conquests to add to her domain, whose day for purchasing Louisianas and Alaskas is over—America, that is inviting the overflow populations of the world to take possession of her territory and is giving to every one the privilege of citizenship, that allows even aliens to possess her soil—does America hope that the law of cause and effect will suspend itself for her benefit, or that the consequences which followed the mistakes of Rome will not follow like mistakes when committed by a Republic of the nineteenth century? She would seem indeed to be confident that a miracle will happen for her protection, to judge by the stupendous recklessness of her policy in regard to the land. She is squandering her public land at such a rate that it would be rash to name the hour beyond which there will be a square foot of it still left; and she has allowed to intrench themselves upon her soil systems and conditions of land tenure that have spread ruin and misery wherever they have been given a footing in the Old World. Rome, even in the days of the Gracchi, was at least able to fall back on the fact that she had given no individual a fee-simple title to more of the public domain than the 500 jugera deemed sufficient for a homestead, and that all who held more than that held it illegally. America seems anxious only to bestow her soil as completely out of her hands as possible, and to leave the proprietors of her mammoth grants as irresponsible as absolute monarchs in the disposition of their possessions. Even now agriculture, the pride of America as it was of Rome, is seeing its aspects revolutionized, is seeing the small proprietor being transformed into the tenant-at-will, the independent small holding passing away and its place taken by the large estate—the latifundium— with its landlord, its agent, its rack-rents, its oppression, its misery, and its hopelessness. How far otherwise the parallel may be extended between the two great republics of the world—and the Americans are no wiser, harder-headed, farther-seeing, or fonder of freedom and independence than were the fathers and citizens of early Rome—how nearly pointed on the course that Rome followed to her ruin, from democracy to plutocracy, from plutocracy to imperialism, is America to-day, it would be bootless here to conjecture. But there is a forecast one may make that is as practical as a meteorologist's storm-warning. It is that the day for an American Licinius has arrived who will reform the landlord and tenant tenures, remodel the homestead and pre-emption, the timber-culture and desert-laws under which so much fraud is perpetrated, and restrain the encroachments of monopoly upon the public domain. Let us hope, with an abiding faith in American human nature and lawcraft, that the new laws will not be so framed that the men of money can evade them, and that the American Senator who takes the part of Licinius will not, like his cynical prototype, be their earliest violator. Let us hope that the evil may be checked in time before it take root and spread, and before it be left for some Tiberius Gracchus, in noble desperation, to shake the Republic to its foundations, and fail of his object after all.

THOMAS P. GILL.

POSTSCRIPT.—Since the forgoing article was written, the startling report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1885 has appeared—a document that confirms some of the worst anticipations above expressed. Land Commissioner Sparks finds that "the magnificent estate of the nation in its public lands has been to a wide extent wasted under defective and improvident laws, and through a laxity of public administration astonishing in a business sense, if not culpable in recklessness of official responsibility." From the outset of his administration he was "confronted with overwhelming evidences that the public domain was being made the prey of unscrupulous speculation and the worst forms of land monopoly, through systematic frauds carried on and consummated under the public land laws." The Commissioner gives most interesting particulars of these "frauds," and recommends the immediate amendment of several of the existing land laws.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take a very few moments of the time of the committee, not to discuss the merits of this bill but simply to give the reasons which will actuate me in voting for it. I think that no gentleman in the course of this debate has overstated, and I think that no one well could overstate, the momentousness of the question involved to a greater or less extent in this proposed legislation—the relation of capital to labor and of labor to capital.

The question which brings these two great social forces into collision is the question of the equitable division of the joint product of labor and capital. Now, in approaching this question we must recognize the fact that progress, that civilization, is not a revolution but an evolution. It is something that works itself out by the gradual processes of the action, reaction, and interaction of great social forces, and we ought to be cautious in discussing this question which involves every man, woman, and child in the Republic, either directly or indirectly, that we say or do nothing which upon the one hand shall tend to kindle into flame the smoldering fires of social disorder which are threatening us, or that upon the other hand shall in any wise strengthen or intensify the already too-grasping power of concentrated and monopolized capital.

The bill which we have before us is an effort—a first effort, perhaps, so far as the Federal Government is concerned—in the direction of the equitable distribution of the joint product of the operations of labor and capital, by bringing them into accordant action and preventing the friction and waste of antagonism. It does not purport to be a remedy for all social evils.

It does not even assume to be a remedy for all the evils that are involved in the controversy between capital and labor. It professes to take simply one step; it may be a short step, it may possibly be an inconsiderable step compared to what some gentlemen would have us take, but it is a step, and a step in the right direction, with a view to bringing capital and labor into harmonious and co-ordinated relations.

It has been said here, perhaps unguardedly, that this bill does absolutely nothing, that it offers nothing to the interests of labor, that it is a delusion, a cheat, and a snare. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not look upon it in that light. It is simple in its provisions; it is plain in its language, and that is one of its merits. It does not purport to do everything, but it does aim to do one thing, and that is to bring into harmonious relations, by voluntary action, assisted by national legislation, the vast interests of aggregated capital upon the one hand and associated and organized labor upon the other. How does it attempt to do that? In the first place, it provides that under the auspices and by the sanctions of law a board of arbitrators shall be established, to which appeal may be made upon the one hand or the other when the representative of the other of these two great interests shall voluntarily come into this relation.

It creates this board of arbitrators under the sanction of law and clothes it with legal powers and obligations. It gives to it the power to send for persons, papers, books, and documents. It compels the opening of these books and documents to the eyes of the arbitrators. It enables them to arrive at the very facts in controversy, to go to the bottom of the facts in issue. It gives the board power to examine witnesses under the sanction of an oath. But not only does it create the board, clothe it with judicial power, empower it to send for and examine persons and papers, it provides that this board shall make an award. It is to determine the question as to which party is right and which party wrong.

The report of this board is to be filed in the office of the Bureau of Labor. It becomes a part of the public records for reference. It is to be published to the world; and being so recorded and so published, it becomes a factor in the creation of a public sentiment that will sustain the right and demand redress for the wrong. As has been to-day so well and eloquently said both by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] and the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], the ultimate tribunal to which appeal must be made in this controversy is the common sense of the world. Against the deliberate verdict of that tribunal neither party to the controversy could long stand.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Let me finish my remarks, and then if I have any time I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, the conflict which is now waged is the outcome of our new civilization. We are just passing through a transition period. Fifty years ago we had no railroads, no steamboats, no telegraphs. We are to-day in the midst of a transition period from the old to the new. The introduction of new physical forces, the progress of invention, the vast forces of machinery displacing multitudes of laborers, the influx of great multitudes of immigrants from foreign lands have all created new conditions of the social problem. Men are flocking to the great centers of population; money is being aggregated there; and to-day we are face to face with this new condition of our civilization. I have no fear that the American people will not have the necessary moderation, the common sense, the wisdom to solve this question successfully. But they need the help of legislation to do it. They need, among other things, that we shall create this board and clothe it with the powers which this bill proposes, in order that it may ascertain and report the facts, may arrive at the right and the wrong of the question at issue, so that the force of public opinion, which is above all law, which creates all law, which underlies all law, may apply itself to the solution of the controversy between the capitalist and the laborer.

I shall vote for this bill, Mr. Chairman, because, although it does not provide for all that we could wish to have done, it does, at least a part, and is a step toward the desired end, and facilitates further legislation which may properly follow.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that I have six minutes left.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If I have any remaining time, I will now yield for the question to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has two minutes left.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, in legislating on this subject we should do no wrong to the laboring men; we should enact no law that will work to the detriment of the class whom the bill proposes to benefit; and, in view of this, I desire to ask the gentleman who has just addressed the House whether the clause permitting these commissioners who are to be appointed to summon witnesses, to call for the production of books and papers, and to imprison for contempt parties who may refuse to testify, would not permit the commissioners to compel the Knights of Labor to disclose the secrets of their order, to reveal any resolutions that may have been passed, or any action that may have been taken in their societies, and which they would desire to keep secret? I wish to know whether this bill would not permit every such thing to be made public?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I think the gentleman's little speech has taken all my time and has answered itself. I suppose the law must treat the parties equally. I surrender the floor to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] that if this bill is susceptible of that construction let him draught an amendment preventing any such construction and I will vote for it. Let him not carp, but improve. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. HOPKINS. If this bill is in the interest of the laboring man I want to support it. If these gentlemen who have draughted it——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I repeat that I do not think the bill is susceptible of any such construction; but if it be, let the gentleman draught an amendment and let us vote upon it.

Mr. LONG. It is not susceptible of that construction, unless the Knights of Labor should be a party to some arbitration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is entitled to the floor for six minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WELLBORN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A concurrent resolution to print the report of the National Academy of Sciences with its appendices for the year 1885; and

A concurrent resolution providing for the printing of the report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, by First Lieut. A. W. Greely.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. DINGLEY addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, obtained the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman to yield for a motion that the committeee rise.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I am perfectly willing to do so, with the understanding that I shall be entitled to the floor when this question comes up again.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a substitute which I wish to offer to the bill when I have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask by unanimous consent that members who desire to do so may be allowed to print remarks on this bill.

Mr. DUNN. That can be done, but not in committee.

Mr. O'NEILL's motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported the bill (H. R. 7480) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not necessary.

OHIO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE, HURD VS. ROMEIS.

Mr. TURNER, from the Committee on Elections, submitted a report in the contested-election case of Hurd vs. Romeis, and moved that it be printed and laid over.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. A minority of the Committee on Elections desire to submit their views on the contested-election case of Frank H. Hurd vs. Jacob Romeis, and to ask that the same be printed. This expression of their views is in process of preparation, but is not yet completed; and I have to ask on behalf of that minority that leave of the House be given to file the same at any time during the ensuing five days.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. TURNER. I desire to give notice that I will endeavor to call up the contested-election case of Hurd vs. Romeis at an early day next week.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, by unanimous consent had leave to print in the RECORD the following substitute for the bill now pending in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, which he intends to offer at the proper time:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a commission to be known as the United States commission of arbitration be, and the same is hereby, created, to consist of five members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The names of persons qualified to act as members of said commission may be suggested to the President by each of the three following associations, namely: First, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; second, the Knights of Labor; and third, that association of farmers which has the most numerous membership; but not more than one member of each of said associations shall be appointed a member of the commission, nor shall two of said commissioners be citizens of the same State, nor more than —— belong to the same political party. The President shall designate which two commissioners shall be first appointed for the term of three years, which two for two years, and which one for one year; and commissioners thereafter to be appointed to fill vacancies occurring by expiration of terms of service shall hold office for three years. Vacancies occurring by death or resignation of commissioners appointed under this act shall be filled only for the unexpired term. It shall be unlawful for a member of this commission, or for any of its employés, to be interested, either directly or indirectly, in any company or corporation performing any part of the work of a common carrier, or to accept or use free transportation by any common carrier over land or water, or to accept or use the free transmission of messages over a telegraph wire.

SEC. 2. That the said board of commissioners shall choose a president and secretary from their own number; and each commissioner shall receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum, together with necessary traveling and incidental expenses. The Commission shall be divided into sections of two members, and each section may employ a stenographer, whose compensation shall be fixed by the commission. The salaries of the commissioners and all necessary or proper expenses of the commission shall be audited and paid by the accounting officers of the Treasury, upon vouchers to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of such commission, either upon its own motion or upon the information, under oath, of three reputable citizens, that public travel, traffic, or commerce in the several Territories and District of Columbia, or among the several States, or intercommunication over railway, steamboat, or telegraph lines, has been interrupted or suspended by reason of differences between employers and employés, or that such interruption or suspension is probable and imminent, to inquire into and ascertain the nature and ground of such differences, and, upon due information of all facts and circumstances connected therewith, to recommend to the several parties concerned such terms of arbitration or settlement of differences as may be deemed just and proper, to be determined by a majority of the section of the board of commissioners acting upon the same. In the event that such terms of arbitration shall be refused or neglected by the several parties, the action of the said section shall be promptly submitted to a quorum of the entire board of commissioners for its consideration and decision, and the findings of fact thereupon by the said commission shall be accepted as competent evidence in any United States district or circuit court. It shall be competent for the commission in such case, through its officers or by a district attorney of the United States, to submit its findings of fact and its decision to any judge of the United States district or circuit court presiding within the jurisdiction of the Territories or States wherein the said trade, traffic, and commerce shall have been interrupted or suspended; and said judge of said court shall summarily examine into the same, and may review, modify, approve, or disapprove the whole or any part or portion of the same.

SEC. 4. That when the said findings and decisions of the said board of commissioners shall be so reviewed by the said district or circuit judge, the same shall be entered upon the records of said court in the nature of a judicial decree, which shall be served upon the party or parties concerning whom said decree shall be made, requiring such party or parties to do and perform certain act or acts, if any, as measures of just and fair arbitration; and if, upon such reasonable notice as the court may direct, the terms of said decree shall be disobeyed, set at naught, and rendered inoperative by said party or parties, the same shall be held to be a contempt of court, to be punished by fine and imprisonment, either or both, in such amount or for such term as the court may see fit; and the usual process shall issue from said court to enforce its orders in this behalf.

SEC. 5. That the commission, or any such judge of a district or circuit court, are hereby empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and examine witnesses in any matter or proceeding relating to the duties of arbitration as provided and contemplated by this act; and the said commission shall have the right to call upon the judge of any United States district or circuit court for the services of its officers in compelling attendance of witnesses, serving processes, or conducting examinations. The commission shall file a full report of its proceedings with the Secretary of the Interior on or before December 30 in each year, together with such recommendations for additional legislation as it may deem desirable, and the same shall be transmitted to Congress for its information.

SEC. 6. That in the event that differences between employers and employés, other than those heretofore contemplated by this act, shall result in what is commonly known as a "strike" or "lock-out," and in the event that such differences or strike shall seriously impair an important trade industry, and in the event that either of said employers or employés in such private industrial pursuit shall request arbitration, said commission may cause one of its sections to examine into such differences, and make such recommendations to the several parties as it shall determine to be just and proper; but its function in such case shall terminate with said recommendation.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

On motion of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, by unanimous consent leave was granted to members to print remarks in the RECORD on the pending labor-arbitration bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I give notice that to-morrow after the reading of the Journal I will move to go into committee on the labor-arbitration bill and move to close debate at 3 o'clock.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

On motion of Mr. HERBERT, by unanimous consent the following resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved, That Tuesday, the 13th day of April, 1886, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, except Mondays and Fridays, not to interfere with revenue bills, regular appropriation bills, and bills from the Committee on Public Lands for the forfeiture of land grants where they may have preference, nor with the morning hours, nor with the hour for the call of committees for the consideration of business, nor with prior orders, be set apart for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6664) entitled "To increase the naval establishment."

ORDNANCE AND WAR SHIPS.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Commission on Ordnance and War Ships, submitted a report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Commission on Ordnance and War Ships, also submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the House Calendar:

Resolved, That the report of the Commission on Ordnance and War Ships be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations, so far as the said committees have jurisdiction of the matter considered by said commission.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. MCRAE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy; when the Speaker signed the same.

And then, on motion of Mr. HAMMOND (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 1, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the General Assembly of Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio:

1. That we view with alarm the serious losses sustained by wool-growers and sheep-breeders in this State during the past three or four years. In number their flocks have been reduced during the past year 290,000, by the official report of the auditor. In quantity the clip has been reduced since 1883 1,600,000 pounds, according to the most careful estimates. In value the clip of 1885 has been reduced at least 10 cents per pound, which, estimating the production prior to the act of 1883 at 30,000,000 pounds, exhibits an annual loss on the clip alone of $3,000,000. Such depression to this important agricultural industry demands earnest and profound consideration.

2. If this depression continues it will very soon reduce the flocks still further and cause many wool-growers to abandon this and engage in other agricultural pursuits, whereby an increased quantity of food will be added to an already oversupplied market, and thus other branches of agricultural industry must certainly and unavoidably suffer.

3. That the various agricultural interests of the State are inseparable, and so far as the influence of economic legislation relates to them one can not be benefited or injured without affecting others; therefore, to abandon one of these pursuits needing protection to the free and unopposed competition of foreign nations under the pretense that their productions are raw material and that manufactured articles only should be protected, will be both unwise and unjust, and will inaugurate an economic policy that will protect comparatively but few, while it will abandon and destroy many.

4. Recognizing the fact that the present alarming condition of the business of sheep husbandry is due largely, if not entirely, to the reduction of duties on foreign wools made by the tariff of 1883, we respectfully insist upon a restoration of the duties upon imported wools as they were established by the act of 1867, or what will be fully their equivalent, and respectfully instruct the Senators and earnestly request the members of the House of Representatives in Congress from this State to use every honorable exertion to restore to wool-growers the same protection which they had prior to the passage of the act of 1883.

5. That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to our Senators and to each member of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Lima, Ohio, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Lima and Ironton, in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of civilian employés of the supply department of the Army, praying for the passage of a bill for the restoration of their salaries to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Moingona and Des Moines, in the State of Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Howard's Grove Baptist church, of Jefferson County, Iowa, praying for the passage of Senate bill 355, creating a tribunal for international arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of civilian employés of the supply department of the Army, remonstrating against certain provisions of the bill (H. R. 6395) for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Richmond, Va., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STANFORD presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Sacramento and San Francisco, in the State of California, praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of California, remonstrating against the proposed reduction or abolition of the impost duty on chrome iron ore; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Lodi, San Joaquin County, California, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in schools under Federal jurisdiction; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of California, praying for the distribution of the undistributed portion of the Geneva award; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the anti-Chinese convention of the State of California, lately assembled at Sacramento, praying for the prohibition of Chinese immigration into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HARRISON presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Andrews, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON. I present certain resolutions, certified by the recording secretary and under the seal of the assembly, of the Wabash Assembly No. 2281, of the Knights of Labor, of Terre Haute, Ind., praying Congress to pass a law prohibiting aliens or their agents from securing vast tracts of the public domain. I believe this subject is under consideration by the Committee on Public Lands at this time, and I will ask the reference of the resolutions to that committee.

Mr. DOLPH. A bill on the subject has been reported.

Mr. HARRISON. I am advised by the Senator from Oregon that the bill has been reported.

I ask leave to say at this time that I know of few measures of greater importance than this. I noticed recently in one of the Chicago papers the results of some inquiry upon this subject, and it seemed to indicate that vast tracts of our domain, not simply the public domain on the frontier but in some of our newer States, are passing into the hands of wealthy foreigners.

It seems that the land reforms in Ireland and the movement in England in favor of the reduction of large estates and the distribution of the lands among persons who will cultivate them for their own use are disturbing the investments of some Englishmen, and that some of them are looking to this country for the acquisition of vast tracts of land, which may be held by them and let out to tenants, out of the rents of which they may live abroad.

I think this evil requires early attention, and that Congress should by law restrain the acquisition of such tracts of land by aliens. Our policy should be small farms worked by the men who own them. As the bill has been reported, I move that the resolutions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Newark,

N. J., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the New Jersey State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, commending the efforts already made and urging still further legislation for the protection of food-fish upon the Atlantic coast; which were referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

He also presented a petition of Local Assembly No. 1160, Knights of Labor, of New Jersey, praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory to settlement, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. William H. Hussey, Mrs. C. C. Hussey, Mrs. Henrietta W. Johnson, and other citizens of New Jersey, praying for legislation affording better legal protection to young girls in the District of Columbia, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE. I present a memorial of Local Assembly No. 4727, Knights of Labor, of the city of Bath, Me., 600 being present and unanimously adopting the resolution, remonstrating against the free-ship bill now pending before Congress, declaring that its passage will ring the death-knell of the only means of support of hundreds of thousands of families of skilled mechanics and laborers, and completely crush the ship-building business of the United States. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Auburn, Me., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GIBSON presented a petition of citizens of the parish of Natchitoches, Louisiana, praying that an appropriation be made for the erection of a public building at Natchitoches for the accommodation of the United States land office and post-office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of Local Assembly 3701, Knights of Labor, of Pennsylvania, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the A. C. Harmer Club, of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Society for Organizing Charity, praying for the passage of a bill for the establishment of post-office savings-banks; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of citizens of Jones County, Texas, praying that an appropriation be made to secure deep water across the Galveston Bar; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRAY presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Wilmington, Del., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB presented memorials of Knights of Labor of Weir and Peterton, in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Peterton, Kans., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of public improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LIST OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of employés of the Treasury Department. The committee report in favor of printing the usual number of this list. The lists of all the other Departments of the Government have been already ordered printed by the Senate. The estimated cost of printing this list is $32.50, and we ask that it be ordered printed.

The report was agreed to.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. MANDERSON. There was referred to the Committee on Printing a letter of the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting copies of accounts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. The committee report adversely to the printing of this list. It does not seem to be required.

The report was agreed to.

SENATE RULES AND MANUAL.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably with an amendment the resolution for printing 1,000 additional copies of the Senate Rules and Manual. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, submitted by Mr. INGALLS March 23, as follows:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of Senate Rules and Manual be printed for the use of the Senate.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was, after the word "printed," to insert "and bound in cloth;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of Senate Rules and Manual be printed and bound in cloth for the use of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

REPORT ON PORT ORFORD BREAKWATER.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Committee on Printing instruct me to report back the letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the construction of the breakwater at Port Orford, Oreg. We find that the printing of the usual number of this report will cost $261. This was called for under a resolution of the Senate. The committee recommend that the usual number be printed.

The report was agreed to.

RIVER IMPROVEMENTS IN OREGON.

Mr. MANDERSON. There was referred to the Committee on Printing a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of Major Jones, United States Army, engineer in charge of river improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory. This document is considered a very important one by the Senators from Oregon. We find that the cost of printing the usual number will be $272. The matter was called for by resolution of the Senate. The committee recommend the ordering of the printing of the usual number.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I wish to inquire whether the report of the Secretary of War in relation to Columbia River, which the Senator from Nebraska has just reported in favor of printing, has or has not been referred to any committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not referred to any committee except to the Committee on Printing, the Chair is advised.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. If it is proper at this time, I desire to move that that portion of the report only which relates to the proposed improvements at the Dalles of the Columbia be referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and that the remainder of the report be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I will state the reasons in a word, which I hope will be satisfactory to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and I am satisfied they will be.

The Senate Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard is investigating now, under the direction of the Senate, the question as to proposed improvements at the Dalles of the Columbia. An order of the Senate to that effect was made over two months ago; and a subcommittee has been designated by the chairman of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard to investigate and report to the full committee. It is important in the investigation that that committee shall have this report before them. That is all that is desired.

It is not the intention to take out of the hands of the Committee on Commerce the matter of making or recommending appropriations. Nothing of that kind is contemplated. Under the resolution of the Senate the Committee on Transportation Routes is simply instructed to inquire into the question as to what measures it may be necessary for Congress to take in order to overcome the obstructions to navigation at the Dalles of the Columbia. We simply wish to have the report before our committee for that purpose. Then when the question as to appropriations comes to be considered, that as a matter of course will go to the Committee on Commerce; and I suggest by my motion that all the remainder of the report now go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that that would be contrary to the rules maintained by the Senate. The rules require that all matters relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the proposition can not be made in this way to take out one part here and another there, and change the rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question as to which committee a matter shall be referred to is entirely within the power of the Senate. Usually, if there is a dispute and two different committees are suggested as being proper to have charge of a subject, the Senate decides the question by a vote.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the rules require that certain general public matters shall be referred to the several appropriate committees. We might as well refer matters relating to the improvement of harbors to the Military Committee, if that be the power. I presume there must be some rule in regard to such questions of reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules expressly provide that where two motions are made to refer a subject-matter to different committees the question shall first be put on the committee first named.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I do not understand that there is any rule of the Senate which requires this report to be referred to any particular committee, so far as that is concerned; and I am certainly unable to see why Senators who happen to be members of the Committee on Commerce should object to the very reasonable suggestion, as it seems to me, which I made.

The Senate has already ordered, as I stated a moment ago, the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard to investigate and report to the Senate what measures, if any, are proper to be adopted by Congress in order to overcome the obstruction to navigation at the Dalles of the Columbia. A subcommittee have been designated by the committee on that subject, and they are proceeding now with the investigation. As a matter of course, it is important that the committee making this investigation, authorized to make it by the Senate, should have before it the report of the Engineer Department upon the subject.

If that committee should finally report that the proper measures to be adopted in order to overcome the obstructions at that point require appropriations for the construction of a canal, or appropriations to aid in the construction of a ship-railway, or what not, then it will be a matter for the consideration of the Committee on Commerce to determine whether the appropriation shall be made. It seems to me that there should be no objection whatever on the part of the Committee on Commerce to having that portion of the report, which is all I ask, referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. CONGER. After the Senator occupied such portion of time as he was entitled to, and got in, in the midst of the few remarks that I was humbly endeavoring to make, a repetition of what he had said before, so that it should appear twice in the RECORD, I will go on with some remarks which I shall make in my feeble way. I do not know what benefit it may be for the Senator to insert his remarks in the middle of the humble remarks that I may make, but doubtless he thinks it will add some importance to his statement, or he would not insist upon so inserting them.

The report under consideration was made in pursuance of a law reported by the Committee on Commerce requiring the engineers to make this report for the benefit of the Committee on Commerce and of the Senate. The committee having examined all this matter, unfortunately having examined it and made the report some time ago and got the bill passed before the Senator from Oregon was here, not knowing certainly at that time that he would be here, because if we had known it of course the Committee on Commerce would not have presumed to do anything of the kind—but having put into the bill two years ago the order for this very examination in the usual way, the Committee on Commerce naturally think they might have the result of their labor, the result of the law that they had passed, and not have it taken away from them to go to any other committee, even if new members have come into the Senate since that time who want to take possession of it.

I state then that this report is the result of an order embodied in a law reported by the Committee on Commerce for an exploration and an examination of this water way long before the subject had been taken up by the other committee. It is necessary that all the reports in regard to river and harbor improvements should be together under the control of the Committee on Commerce. I will say that there has been a careful and studious effort to take from the control of the Committee on Commerce certain routes and make separate bills and appropriations apart from the river and harbor appropriation bill, to put the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers under separate commissions, and so on.

I presume the Committee on Commerce will not object to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard having access to this document. For their purposes they will have all this information without its being taken away from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan will please direct his remarks in this direction, so that the Reporter may get them. It is difficult to hear him.

Mr. CONGER. I was addressing the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not so as to be heard by the Reporter.

Mr. CONGER. But to emphasize it, and that my friend in the rear, to whose remarks I am replying, might also hear, I was addressing myself a little that way, gracefully as I thought, without intending to offend the Chair at all, or the Reporter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair only made the interruption for the benefit of the Senator, so that he might be reported.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from Oregon very kindly says that I have said enough. If he surrenders the point I certainly do not wish to occupy the attention of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CONGER. I wait to hear what the Senator has to say.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The Senator from Michigan is under a misapprehension when he says that I yielded the point.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the Senator to say that I had said enough. I do not know what else he could have meant.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I said nothing——

Mr. CONGER. If I have not said enough I might go on and say more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say in behalf of the Committee on Commerce that having by their own action in their own bill procured this report they desire to have the benefit of it. Let me say to Senators here that if every river and harbor appropriation or if the improvement of any of the rivers is to be taken from the Committee on Commerce and divided up among whatever other committees may desire to get possession of the subject, there will not be a very satisfactory river and harbor bill passed here. Many interests will be endangered, as they are continually, by dividing up such questions, for the committee which has charge of the bill (already in the House amounting to between $15,000,000 and $16,000,000), must have the control of all the river and harbor improvements and the appropriations therefor, to make any bill that they could report to the Senate satisfactory, and not be left to have other committees report on separate improvements additional or separate amounts. They must go together.

I venture to say that any improvement which is taken from the general subject of river and harbor improvements and put under any other committee, unless by order of the Senate and by the enactment of a law making separate committees for it, not only endangers the passage of the general river and harbor bill, but makes an incongruous mass of appropriations which the Senate can not justify and which, in my opinion, it could not pass.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Are there not two distinct propositions in this one report?

Mr. CONGER. The report has not been printed, and it has not been read. It has been made by the engineers in pursuance of a law reported to the Senate by the Committee on Commerce asking for this information. The report is made in pursuance, and only in pursuance, of that law for the benefit of the Senate through its Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I wish to express my thanks to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], the honorable member of the Committee on Commerce who represents the lakes more particularly and the country at large generally, and I wish to express my thanks not only to him but to the whole Committee on Commerce, provided he speaks for the whole committee, for the great consideration he has manifested, to the effect that he personally will permit the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard to read this report after it is printed, and that he will use all the influence he may have with his associates to get their permission to allow the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard to read it. That is very kind indeed on the part of the Senator from Michigan!

Mr. CONGER. I desire——

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me now. It is a very great consideration upon his part, I am sure, and I feel very much obliged to him that he has been so considerate as to exercise his great influence in that direction and for that purpose.

Another thing I wish to suggest is that if the Senator from Michigan desires to abolish the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, I insist he shall go about it in the proper way and according to rule; that he shall bring up the subject in a proper manner, and proceed as a Senator should proceed if he desires to abolish one of the standing committees of this body.

Now, what is the proposition of the Senator from Michigan? As I said before, and I will repeat it a third time although the Senator thinks I have stated it twice heretofore, the Senate by a solemn vote and by a unanimous vote has directed this standing committee of the Senate to make a certain investigation. The voice of the honorable Senator from Michigan was not lifted in opposition to that proposition when it was made. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce made no objection to it although present. No member of that committee interposed any reason why that investigation was not a proper one to be made by that particular committee, but, on the contrary, the resolution directing that committee was adopted unanimously by this body two months ago or more.

Now what is the proposition of the honorable Senator and the Committee on Commerce? It is simply that after this has been done by the Senate, after this investigation has been ordered, the Senator will withhold from that committee the proper departmental reports necessary to enable it to make the investigation. That is what it amounts to.

The Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN], the honorable chairman of the Committee on Commerce, must certainly see that there is no disposition upon my part, or upon the part of the committee for which I am speaking for the moment, to interfere in any manner or shape with the legitimate and proper duties or privileges of the Committee on Commerce. I presume that it is not the intention of the committee I represent even perhaps to recommend appropriations. That is not the scope of the resolution under which we are acting. The purpose of the investigation is to determine what proper means may be adopted by Congress to overcome the obstructions to navigation at that particular point in the Columbia River. It is necessary that this portion of the report of Major Jones should be before that committee, not by the permission of the Senator from Michigan or the permission of any other Senator that we may be permitted to read it, but it is necessary that it should be there officially, it is proper that it should be there officially; and it seems to me it does not interfere in any shape, manner, or form with the scope of the duties or powers or privileges of the Committee on Commerce.

That is why I ask that only that portion of the report may go to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard. It is simply to enable us to execute the order of the Senate that I have asked it. If in this state of the case a majority of the Senate think that it is not proper it should go there, of course they will vote accordingly. I think we are entitled to it; I think after having directed the investigation the Senate should give the benefit of the departmental report necessary to conduct that investigation to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that as much of the report transmitted by the Secretary of War as refers to the improvements of the Columbia River at the Dalles shall be referred to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and that the remainder of the report be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think the entire report should go to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that motion as an amendment?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir; and I wish merely to make a few remarks in connection with the motion.

The Columbia River is one of the very important navigable streams of this country, and one of the largest in the country. The Committee on Commerce have been making examinations of that river through the reports of the engineers who have had charge of the interests of the navigable streams on the Pacific coast as well as elsewhere. We have already entered upon a vast improvement of one locality in the Columbia River known as the Cascades. That is an obstruction of the river about half way between the Dalles and the mouth of the river. Under the report of the examinations of the Engineer Department the Government has already entered upon the construction of a canal around the Cascades. Locks are in process of construction there, and that impediment to the navigation of the river is about to be removed.

The Dalles is another of the serious obstructions to navigation there. It will require a vast expense, of course, to overcome that obstacle. As the Senator from Michigan suggested, steps have already been taken to examine into the subject of an improvement at the Dalles. The Committee on Commerce have had charge of it.

So far as the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard is concerned, I have no objection whatever that they enter upon any examination they see proper in regard to that matter, but it should not interfere with the examinations which the Committee on Commerce have already entered upon. Certainly no disadvantage can result to that region of country for the want of a representative upon the Committee on Commerce, because the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is a member of that committee, and will doubtless present to that committee all the interests which can be advanced in regard to the improvement of the river there.

I think it would be well for the Senator from Oregon who has made the motion to refer a part of the report to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard to permit the whole report to go to the Committee on Commerce. Of course that will not interfere with the examination of the subject by the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard. If they have any matter to present to the Senate in the shape of a report, it can be made to the Senate and referred to any other committee to which the Senate sees proper to refer it; so that all the information which can be obtained either from that committee or from the Corps of Engineers in charge of the navigable rivers of the country may come before the Committee on Commerce.

I think the motion as moved by me should be carried.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I regret very much to take up the time of the Senate in the morning hour with this matter, but I desire to make a statement in reference to this report which has not yet been made.

Major Jones, of the Engineer Corps, made a report. He was in charge of the improvements of the Columbia River generally, and he was directed, of course, to report in regard to all the proposed improvements of the Columbia River to his chief. He submitted his report. In that report he made suggestions in regard to a proposed improvement at the Dalles of the Columbia. When that report of Major Jones was transmitted to Congress all that portion of it relating to the proposed improvement of the Columbia River at the Dalles was stricken out and was not sent to the Senate and House of Representatives. So that the report of Major Jones in regard to the improvements of the Columbia River, with the exception of that portion relating to the proposed improvements at the Dalles, has already been printed, and has already been referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The report that we are talking about now is one sent in by the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution of the Senate, introduced by myself and agreed to by the Senate, directing him to transmit to the Senate the whole of the report of Major Jones relating to the improvements of the Columbia River. In answer to that resolution the Secretary of War has forwarded the report now on the desk, which includes not only that portion of the report heretofore forwarded, but also that portion which was not forwarded heretofore, and which is now forwarded in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate directing the Secretary of War to transmit the whole. These are the facts in relation to this report.

Now, then, it does seem to me that in so far as the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard ask that this particular portion of the report be referred to that committee, it is only asking that which it has a right to ask, that it is not interfering in any respect with the privileges of the Committee on Commerce. That is not the intention. I have no disposition, so far as I am concerned personally, to interfere with any of the privileges of that committee. The purpose of this investigation is not to make appropriations; it is simply to investigate a subject that has been directed to be investigated by the Senate; and this portion of that report, which is not a recommendation of appropriations—because if it were then it would be proper it should go to the Committee on Commerce—but simply relates to certain suggested improvements, not suggested appropriations, at the Dalles of the Columbia should properly go to that committee.

Now, it does seem to me that instead of my giving way to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and permitting this portion of the report to go to that committee, it would be nothing more than a proper thing for the chairman of that committee and his associates to give way to me and permit this portion of the report, under the circumstances, to go to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest that the report be printed, and then we can see where it properly belongs.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I am willing to agree to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print has already been made. The report will lie on the table until it is printed.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. All right.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JACKSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 709) for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana, to report it with an amendment, and accompanying the majority report are the conclusions of the minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the majority and the views of the minority will be printed, and the bill placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CALL, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1657) to legalize the incorporation of national trades' unions, reported it with amendments.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1084) to authorize the purchase of five manuscript volumes (being letter-books) of William Vans Murray, formerly minister at The Hague and at Paris, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2023) providing for the payment of $2,500 to Theophilus Fiske Mills, for executing a model and design for an equestrian statue of the late General John A. Rawlins; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 943) to pay the Delaware Indians the value of certain lands in Kansas, in compliance with treaty stipulations, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1961) to amend section 3893 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

JOHN F. SLATER.

Mr. SEWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library to report back the joint resolution (S. R. 37) providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John F. Slater. As a joint resolution of the same character has passed the House and is now on the desk, I ask for the immediate consideration of the House joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey, from the Committee on the Library, reports favorably Senate joint resolution 37, and asks that a joint resolution of similar tenor from the House be taken up in its place and now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the House resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (H. Res. 115) providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John F. Slater, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the cost of the medal ordered by public resolution numbered 6, approved February 6, 1883, to be presented to John F. Slater, of Connecticut, then living, but lately deceased.

SEC. 2. That said medal and a copy of the original resolution aforesaid shall be presented to the legal representatives of said John F. Slater, deceased.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 115) providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John F. Slater.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate joint resolution 37 on the same subject will be indefinitely postponed.

MONUMENT TO ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. SEWELL. The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2012) for the erection of a monument to the late Abraham Lincoln, have instructed me to report it favorably without amendment; and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I ask permission to say one word.

This bill, which I had the honor of introducing, and which was referred on my motion to the Committee on the Library, proposes to appropriate $500,000 to the erection of a monument in this city to the memory of Abraham Lincoln. Its provisions, except as to amount and name, are exactly the same as those incorporated in the bill reported from the same committee proposing to erect a monument to the memory of General Grant.

Mr. President, time will not dim nor lessen the glory that clusters around the name of Lincoln. His greatness, his nobility of character, and his great deeds will stand forth before the world more and more grandly as the years pass by. When generations and centuries shall have gone, when granite monuments erected by loving hands shall have crumbled to dust, after nations, yet unknown, shall rise and flourish and fall, the name of Lincoln will be as a household word among the people of every land, of every tongue, and of every kindred, wherever justice has its votaries or where men worship at the shrine of liberty.

After the name of Washington, no name connected with American history is written above the name of Lincoln. To the honor of the nation be it said, a monument high above all other structures reared by human hands on American soil has been erected to the memory of the Father of his Country in the nation's capital as a slight token of the people's love and the people's appreciation of his great services to his country and as a benefactor to his race. While we love to gaze upon that monument, it adds nothing to the fame of Washington, which is wide as the world and as enduring as time. Yet the people honor themselves in attempting to honor him who has done so much in the glorious, I had almost said divine, work of establishing this Government, in which the people are sovereign.

I shall not to-day attempt any eulogy upon Abraham Lincoln, who, I am proud to say, was my personal friend. He was a just man, and he said: "Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it." He could not be swerved from his duty and he said: "Come what will I will keep my faith with friend and foe." He was a generous and great-hearted man, full of human sympathy and Christian charity—"with malice toward none and with charity for all." It was he who said "I have not willingly planted a thorn in any man's bosom." Such words, Mr. President, as these, coming from a man whose whole life exemplified their truth, are as clusters of jewels in the crown of manhood shining out with light to the admiring world.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate with further remarks more than to say that in my judgment this Senate can not do better than to appropriate a small portion of the people's money, which for the time being is in part in our care and keeping, in the erection of a suitable monument to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, whose name in the world's history has taken its place by the side of the name of Washington.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SEWELL, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill for the erection of a monument to Abraham Lincoln."

MISSISSIPPI WATER-POWER AND BOOM COMPANY.

Mr. SABIN. In the temporary absence of the chairman [Mr. DOLPH], I submit the report of the conference committee on the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

J. N. DOLPH,
D. M. SABIN,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
CHARLES F. CRISP,
W. D. BYNUM,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the bill here?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will lie on the table, the bill not being in the possession of the Senate.

PRINTING OF A NAVAL REPORT.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 30) authorizing the printing of a naval report, have instructed me to report it adversely and move its indefinite postponement, and at the same time to report favorably a joint resolution which has come to us from the House on the same subject.

The joint resolution (S. R. 30) authorizing the printing of a naval report was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I now ask the present consideration of the House joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. Res. 58) authorizing the printing of a naval report was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that there shall be printed and bound in cloth, at the Government Printing Office, in addition to the "usual number," 4,000 copies of the report of Naval Constructor Philip Hichborn, United States Navy, on European dock-yards, details, fitting, and equipment of foreign vessels, torpedo-boats, ship-yard appliances, tools, &c.; of which additional number 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the House, 500 for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 be delivered to and distributed by the Secretary of the Navy for general information.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 2024) for the relief of Thomas Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 2025) granting a pension to James Butler; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 2026) granting a pension to Wallis Pattee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 2027) making an appropriation for the erection in the city of Key West, Fla., of buildings to be used as fire-proof warehouses; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CALL. I desire to ask the immediate consideration of that bill by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The recent fire at Key West has destroyed all the public buildings, and a large amount of merchandise is there now exposed to the weather, so that immediate action is required.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MAXEY introduced a bill (S. 2028) granting a pension to E. S. Bishop; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 2029) granting a pension to Elvira Bliss Sheldon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2030) granting a pension to Miss Margaret Stafford Worth; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2031) for the relief of Capt. J. O. Skinner, assistant surgeon and acting medical storekeeper of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2032) to settle titles within railroad grants; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SABIN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2033) to authorize the President to confer brevet rank on officers of the Army for gallant services in Indian campaigns; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 2034) to facilitate the business of the Treasury Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK. I believe everything in the bill relates to finance; some portions to appropriations; but there is legislation which the Finance Committee will have to consider. Therefore I refer it there first.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 2035) to authorize the Secretary of War to credit the State of Oregon with the sum of $12,398.55 for ordnance and ordnance stores to be issued to the Territory of Washington on account of said State in payment for ordnance and ordnance stores borrowed by said State of said Territory during the Nez Percé Indian war of 1877–'78, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 2036) to amend section 3860 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 60) for the purpose of temporarily increasing the number of assistant engineers in the United States Navy by restoring certain cadet-engineers named therein to their legal rights and to their proper office and rank in the United States Navy, authorizing and directing the President to appoint such cadet-engineers (graduates) assistant engineers, to commission them as such, and to antedate their commissions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of the Union National Bank of Louisiana on the files of the Senate be referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXPENSE OF DISTRIBUTING PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. GORMAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish to the Senate the names of each person employed in receiving, folding, and distributing public documents, together with their compensation and all other expenditures made on that account, for the fiscal years 1883, 1884, and 1885.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. INGALLS. Let it lie over and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over and be printed.

AMENDMENT OF RULE.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Rule XIII be amended by striking out the words "without debate," in the last sentence of clause I.

CONSIDERATION OF EXECUTIVE NOMINATIONS.

Mr. PLATT. If this is the proper time I desire to give a notice. I suppose it as proper as any time.

I introduced some time ago a resolution for the consideration of executive nominations in open session, which is on the Senate Calendar No. 163 in the Order of Business, reported adversely. It has been suggested to me that it may be open to a point of order that it is in the nature of an amendment to the rules and does not specify the rules which it proposes to amend, such a resolution requiring to be brought in on one day's notice. I therefore give notice that at the next meeting of the Senate I will propose an amendment to that resolution specifying the particular rules which I desire to have amended and the purpose to be accomplished by such rules when amended.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5003) for the relief of Mary E. Casey; and

A bill (H. R. 7470) for the relief of William Fisher.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, yesterday, approved and signed the act (S. 416) for the relief of J. M. Lobban, and the act (S. 831) for the relief of George S. Storrs, of Texas.

DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair will lay before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] yesterday, which comes over under objection. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia inform the Senate whether either of the said commissioners is now stockholder or director or attorney of either of the street horse-railways or national banks of the District of Columbia or of the Washington Gaslight Company. Also, if not now, whether heretofore either of them has been stockholder, director, or attorney of either of said corporations, and, if so, when he ceased to be such stockholder, director, or attorney as aforesaid.

Mr. VAN WYCK. On Tuesday evening, in the Evening Star, published in this city, was a communication alleged to be from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, which seemed so strange and peculiar at this juncture that it had the appearance at least of having been drawn by a skillful attorney in the interest of the Washington Gaslight Company. As the communication purported to be from the commissioners I took occasion to introduce this resolution, which I presented yesterday, desiring to know the relations of the commissioners of this District with this gaslight company and with other corporations.

I was surprised that it should have met with any objection. The point is not that interest in these companies is a disqualification to holding the position of District commissioner—not by any means—but that the Senate and Congress may know what weight is to be given to suggestions and recommendations made by the board of commissioners. That was all, nothing more; and it is eminently proper at this time that Congress should know about these matters.

The people of this District, as I have said before, are powerless for their own protection. They are denied the ordinary rights given to those residing in far out of the way places in any section of the country. Even the Mormons, who are under the ban of Congress, have more rights than the intelligent population of the city of Washington, for here they have none. Their only lawgiver is Congress, and their only guardians and protectors are those whom the President and the Senate appoint to rule over them under the name of commissioners.

There are great questions not only here but in other cities throughout the length and breadth of this land that force themselves upon consideration. In this District they are to be considered in this Capitol. I refer now to questions arising between corporations and the citizens, between organized capital and labor; and it is eminently proper at this juncture that we at least should understand the relations of those who are appointed to rule over and to act as guardians of this people and the relation which they bear to these great questions.

It would certainly seem remarkable to ninety-nine hundredths of the citizens of Washington and to every Senator on this floor that this board of commissioners should state such things as are asserted in this communication. In the first place they state that they had been led to give great consideration to the matter of the gaslight company. They had come to the conclusion, and argued, that only one gas company should exist in Washington. They do not suggest any other protection that may be given to these people; they do not propose some other way by which this exorbitant corporation shall hold off its hands; but today the attitude is this: The Congress of the United States are holding a population of 200,000 by the throat and grasping their arms by their sides, and allowing corporations to plunder them, while Congress have made them powerless. That is the attitude to-day.

These commissioners can see a great wrong in allowing another gas company to be organized. They have great regard for the streets; they think they should not be torn up, out of regard to the symmetry and beauty of this model city. They have decided convictions on the subject that the streets should not be torn up again, that another company should not invade this beautiful city. They do not show as much regard for the pockets of the thousands here who are plundered by this gaslight corporation, a corporation more despotic, probably, than any other in this whole country.

Where does this corporation get power to make a lien law for itself? These commissioners can say not a word about that. Where does this corporation get the power (which belongs only to Congress) to make a lien law? Are they by their own act to be exempt from the conditions of trade so that they shall never incur a bad debt? In the first place they demand and actually require a deposit from those who they think are unable to make monthly payments—a deposit of more than can pay for the monthly consumption—and then require them to pay their gas bills every week. But the lien law which they attach is still more despotic. The owner of a property rents it, if you please, and goes abroad, and when he comes home at the expiration of a year he finds the gas cut off from his dwelling. He has consumed no gas; he owns the property and has the title. He applies to the gas company to let on the gas; and they say, "No, sir; the tenant that occupied your house when you were gone is indebted to us for a gas bill, and we refuse to turn the gas into your house until you pay the bill incurred by your tenant during your absence."

Why should not the commissioners have referred to this despotic act and shown where the company obtained such authority? But they are determined that the streets shall not be torn up. They can better allow this company 200 per cent. on their original investment than to allow the streets of this model city to be torn up.

It was once said in both ends of this Capitol that we were subsidizing huge land-grant railroads to have competition between different lines. It was a national argument to show that those grants were to secure the rights of people by the establishment of competing lines of railroad; and so we gave empires of land to the Northern Pacific, and we gave empires of land to the Central and Union Pacific, and empires of land to the Southern Pacific in order that we might have competition. And here these gentlemen say in the communication to which I have alluded:

In short, the attempts to lower the price of gas by means of competing companies have usually resulted in rendering lower prices impossible.

So these very acute gentlemen have established two points: first, that there shall be no other gas company here; and, next, that competition does not compete. They go on to show that Congress has the power, for toward the end they say:

That such rates, considering the quality of gas and the cost of coal, could not be complained of as unreasonable, which, although much higher than the average rate in England, was lower than the average in the cities along the Atlantic coast. One reason why gas can not be furnished so cheap in Washington as some of the manufacturing towns is—

Is that what these gentlemen are there for? Is that what Congress made this board of commissioners for? Is that why the President appointed them and the Senate confirmed them, to stand here and issue arguments in favor of the extortions of this corporation?

One reason why gas can not be furnished so cheap in Washington as some of the manufacturing towns is that there is no adequate demand for coke and other residual products, which in many places bring high prices and form a considerable item in reducing the net cost of gas.

These gentlemen know all about it; they know all about tearing up the streets and competition not competing, and give the reasons the gas company want them to allege why they can not reduce the price of gas in Washington. The truth is, as I understand, that there is a demand for coke far more than this corporation can supply. The other residuum is tar. From a ton of coal they have 40 bushels of coke, worth nearly as much as the price they pay for their coal per ton. The residual product these commissioners speak about is tar, so many gallons of tar. This city uses on its streets more tar absolutely than this corporation can furnish. Then it is said they have 10 or 15 gallons of ammonia left. But the residuum they talk about there is an abundant market for so far as the coke and the tar are concerned; yet these gentlemen make it an excuse as an attorney would, and at that most important point these gentlemen stop. I do not know but that these commissioners are the attorneys for this company, for these are the peculiar tactics of an attorney—translucent when they want to be, and opaque when they prefer that. Now they say:

Whether by reason of the increasing demand for gas and reduction in the cost of coal a further reduction in the price of gas should now be made the commissioners are not sufficiently well advised to speak with certainty, but are inclined to think that such reduction—say to $1.25 per thousand—is possible in the near future and would not be unreasonable.

The other part of their discourse is in the present, and they seem to know all about it to use for the best purpose the arguments urged by the Washington Gaslight Company.

With regard to the quality of gas in Washington—

It is notorious here there is complaint about the quality of the gas; everybody knows it. Every householder who has a gas-burner in moderate proximity to his wall sees his wall discolored by the impurities of this gas, and as it goes into the wall it disseminates to his family, and his wife and his children are poisoned by these products. These commissioners do not know about the purity of the gas!

With regard to the quality of gas in Washington city the commissioners believe, judging from such casual examination as they have been able to make, that it compares favorably with that of other cities, but how it would compare measuring by "candle-power" is difficult to say.

Then, toward the conclusion, they say:

The commissioners think there is no need of any further legislation.

Of course not; and it looks very much like the opinion of an attorney or some one deeply in interest.

The commissioners think there is no need of any further legislation upon the subject of gas in the District of Columbia, unless it be to adjust the rates from time to time upon a basis reasonable both for manufacturers and consumers of gas, and as to what precise rate is reasonable the commissioners are not sufficiently advised to say. To form a fair opinion upon that subject would require a careful examination with the aid of an expert.

These gentlemen commissioners may be stockholders, directors, possibly attorneys, of this company. I do not know. When they know that this corporation from $500,000, which it had invested, to-day has a stock of $2,000,000, worth $4,000,000 in the market, has declared yearly dividends of from 10 to 60 per cent. upon even this enlarged stock, these commissioners sitting there say they must have an expert to tell whether the price of gas should be reduced!

Now look at it for a moment. We hear much talk about the conflict between organized capital and organized labor. If you show the people that the Congress of the United States has legalized a corporation with unlimited power to make its own charges, to make its own laws substantially, to make a rate of profit which would be considered usurious in any country in Christendom, what can you expect? These commissioners knew, and if they were directors or stockholders in this company or attorneys for it they knew better still, that a $500,000 investment had grown to $2,000,000 of capital, and all the time large dividends were being made. They knew it from the company's own statements, some of which I took the liberty to read the other day. I have said they increased their capital from $500,000 to $2,000,000, and when they have a capital of $2,000,000 they still keep on declaring 10 and 15 per cent. dividends annually, and in one year, 1883, they declared a dividend of 50 per cent. on $2,000,000, making $1,000,000 in one year, when all that the company originally invested was $500,000. In 1883 it actually paid a dividend of $1,000,000 to the stockholders, twice the amount of the money originally put in the concern.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska what are the powers of the commissioners over this gas company. Have they the right now to regulate the cost, to regulate the quality of gas manufactured and sold by the company, or have they any other control at all?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I presume they have no power. It belongs to the Congress of the United States to control the corporation; but they have some power to protect the people and state to Congress the grievances and extortions under which the people suffer. They can do that instead of coming here as the advocates, defenders, apologists, and excusers of the men who are doing this. That is the point I make in this matter.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator is it an undisputed fact that $500,000 was all that was paid in and that they now have a capital of $2,000,000?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. That is undisputed?

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is undisputed; and I presume, although I am not authorized to say, that probably the original $500,000 was not all in money at that time. They started with $50,000 capital, a few years afterward raised it to $350,000, and afterward to $500,000. But admit that all that $500,000 was paid in cash; if we are to judge anything from the customs and habits of this company, it is not unfair by any means to doubt it; but admit that; listen to their own statement:

November 1, 1868, the cash cost of the works exceeded $1,000,000, while the capital stock was but $500,000. The company having, by act of Congress approved March 24, 1866, obtained the authority to increase the capital stock to $1,000,000, the directors at this time issued to each of the then stockholders as many additional shares of stock as they then held. This was considered to be but just and right, as the earnings of the company beyond dividends paid has been invested in increasing the value of the works. This issue of stock was fully investigated before the passage of the act regulating gas-works, approved June 23, 1874. (See Senate Report No. 395, Forty-third Congress, first session.)

There the president of this company expressly states that they issued this from the surplus earnings after paying these large dividends. Therefore, he says, it was but just to give this to the stockholders. That settles the point, I take it. When the other increase was made later Congress said it should be paid in money. It was $1,000,000 in 1868. Five hundred thousand dollars was taken from the surplus earnings, and that, too, after paying their regular large dividends. Now mark. In 1868 they themselves give the record of a dividend on this $1,000,000 of 15 per cent., and sometimes 20 per cent.

In February, 1874, 5 per cent. was paid, and 50 per cent. was paid in August of that year. In February, 1875, 5 per cent. was paid; 5 per cent. was paid in May, and 10 per cent. was paid in August of that year.

There was 50 per cent. dividend paid on the $1,000,000, which was $500,000.

In February, 1876, 5 per cent. was paid; 10 per cent. was paid in August, and 50 per cent. was paid in October of that year.

So that in 1874 there was a half million extra dividend paid; in 1876 a half million extra dividend was paid, which made a million more that they took into stock to make $2,000,000 capital. That was up to 1881. Now comes 1881, when the stock was $2,000,000. Out of their own pockets they had only paid $500,000, every dollar of which was paid back, besides yearly dividends of 10, 15, and 20 per cent. Now there is a capital of $2,000,000.

II. The following dividends have been paid since January 1, 1881: February, 1881, 5 per cent.; August, 1881, 5 per cent.; February, 1882, 5 per cent.; August, 1882, 5 per cent.; February, 1883, 5 per cent.; May, 1883, 40 per cent. (the dividend of May, 1883, was the accumulation of years, when gas was selling at much higher rates); August, 1883, 5 per cent.

So there was 10 per cent. in 1883 and also this other 40 per cent.; 50 per cent. on $2,000,000 in one year—$1,000,000 in one year, when only $500,000 had been paid out by the stockholders of the company to organize and carry on the concern.

Mr. MORGAN. When were the works commenced?

Mr. VAN WYCK. In 1848. One million dollars dividend was declared in one year; and yet they say the 40 per cent. was an accumulation, and all the while they had been paying these large dividends, one year 15 per cent., one year 20 per cent., and so on.

Mr. GEORGE. What was the rate of dividend paid during the time they acquired the surplus?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Ten to 20 per cent. Then, the year following, after they had cleaned all out, after they had saved $1,000,000 on an original investment of $500,000, they declared 10 per cent., and the next year after 12½ per cent. on $2,000,000.

Look at it for a moment. After they had cleaned all out and made these enormous dividends and got the nominal capital up to two millions, they declared next year 10 per cent. and the next 12½—$200,000 the first year after they had made this enormous dividend of $1,000,000; the next year $250,000. The original investment was $500,000. That brings us down to 1884.

These commissioners talk about cheaper gas being made in manufacturing towns, and we hear very much said about coal gas and about water gas, and that water gas is substituted in some cities. In Baltimore water gas is sold at 50 cents a thousand and coal gas at $1 per thousand feet. By the showing of this company, in addition to the $2,000,000 and the regular dividends, half a million has lately been expended, of which $45,000 was invested in Lowe's patent apparatus, an apparatus used for making gas from water. The next item is $80,344.56 for drawing and stoking machine regenerative furnaces, scrubbers, &c., those things which are used in the manufacture of water gas; and that is what they are making here to-day.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the Senator know the difference in cost between water gas and coal gas?

Mr. VAN WYCK. In Baltimore the water gas is selling for 50 cents and the coal gas for a dollar a thousand feet. These people charge $1.50 a thousand net here; but we need not compare Washington with any other city; it stands by itself. Congress gave this huge corporation the power to establish this plant here and they have made these enormous dividends and this enormous profit. Fifteen years ago they were afraid the electric light would destroy their property and asked Congress to let them alone.

Mr. GORMAN. I know my friend from Nebraska means to be entirely fair, but the statement he makes about the cost of gas in Baltimore does not convey a correct idea. The fact is that the low price of gas in Baltimore which he has stated is under extraordinary circumstances, three or four companies competing, and it is known that to continue to furnish gas at the price stated would bankrupt any company.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator says the competing companies will combine and then increase the price. I presume so, but that shows what I have heretofore said on this floor, that the legislation of this country in your National Congress and in your State Legislatures is in the hands of corporations. Your organized corporations bid you defiance in Baltimore in Maryland, and in New York. They are organized for the purpose of competition, and yet they deny your authority, and they deny the demands of the people as soon as they are organized by "pooling their issues" and exerting their greed of extortion, and what then? You despairingly bemoan the conflict between labor and capital, between corporations and the American people. Unloose this devil-fish which fastens itself upon the prosperity of this nation, and all will be well. There should be no conflict between labor and capital. The citizen finds that a creature of yours has power to defy the Government and the people. Some power of self-protection will surely come to save the people first from the Legislatures and then from their creatures. It is an alarming fact, but it is true.

These commissioners were right in one proposition undoubtedly, that if you organize another company to compete you are probably getting into the hands of two extortioners, who will combine together. That is what is disgusting the American people. That is what is helping to create this "irrepressible conflict" between organized capital and organized labor. Such wrong, no matter whether upon the black, as it was years ago, no matter whether it was in the form of chattel slavery, or whether, as to-day, industrial slavery, brings its punishment. The longer you suffer such cormorants to fasten themselves upon a nation the more difficult it will be and the more serious to loosen the bands.

The managers of this company who make their lien law against those who are not overstocked with the world's goods requiring them to make a deposit of more than their monthly gas bill and then exact payment every week, and who turn the lock upon the owner of the house if the tenant does not pay the gas bill, have increased their capital from $500,000 to $2,000,000; they have been enjoying 100 to 200 per cent. dividends; and now it is said we can not seize them and make them do justice. They have overpowered your District commissioners; and that seems strange. I did not understand it, and therefore I desired to know what it was that induced them to write this letter. I supposed they were appointed to protect the interests of the people, not as the defenders and apologists of corporations, and I thought they must have an interest, and if it was not as stockholders or as directors or as attorneys, it must be something a good deal worse than either. People do not do this sort of thing just for fun or even for pure cussedness; it is something else; there must be a motive.

Now, to show still more the great demoralization, if that term may be employed, or rather the great powers that come to be recognized through corporations, I will read the conclusion of an interview in the Post said to have been held with one of the commissioners, in which, after detailing his own connection with the corporations of this city as having been attorney for twenty years of this gaslight corporation, he concludes by stating that the President would probably not find a District man, if he desired to do so, to act as District commissioner who was not in some way or other entangled with these corporations. If you connect that with the fact that no one else except one of that tribe can obtain a position, you will see the point:

> Most of our judges have interests in many corporations, and yet are able to decide cases impartially.

No doubt it was a very able lawyer who said that. A judge on the bench who has railroad stock in his pocket is debarred from deciding cases in which the railroad is interested. Of course when a great railroad comes and asks legislation or asks Congress to make a law that a judge even if he has railroad stock in his pocket can be allowed to sit in judgment on cases of corporations, Congress will be expected to yield to that request; but to-day this eminent lawyer commissioner of the District is wrong. A judge having stock of a corporation in his own pocket is not now competent to decide a case in which the company is interested.

I think we may also ask for an explanation of the relation these commissioners have to street railways and also to national banks, as well as to the gaslight company. Certainly one commissioner is a director of a national bank. That does not necessarily prevent his being commissioner, but it affects very much the consideration of the bank's affairs. It is a notorious fact known to everybody in Washington—the Congress of the United States know it, the District commissioners know it—that the national banks here since their creation have paid no local taxation on their stock. To-day there is three million capital in private banks and national banks, and yet no taxes paid on the stock. Will anybody justify that?

A few days ago generous legislation was offered in this body after a quarter of a million dollars or more had been kept out of the treasury of this District by organized capital, national banks and private banks refusing to pay their taxes. It was proposed that when the taxes and assessments against a property were equal to its assessed value the owners need not pay more. Such is justice in this model city! The District shall be content to take the property and not confiscate the balance of the man's estate, if he has any.

Mr. GEORGE. Who makes the tax law here?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Congress makes the tax law. Then we desire to know the relations of the commissioners with the street-railway corporations.

We hear much talk about education, and the social circle and family influence; and yet day after day and week after week there were fathers, drivers and conductors on said lines, who never looked on their children's faces during the daylight, nor saw them awake. My friend from Maryland can see why the revolt is coming now. The model city of the Union! You were shocked when chained gangs of slaves were paraded beneath the shadow of the Capitol and under the Stars and Stripes. When the minors of widowed mothers at the foot of Capitol Hill hitch the horses all the day long, working from twelve to sixteen hours and is deprived of necessary sleep, we hear no word of protest.

Therefore we ask to know the interest these men have in the car lines and other corporations of the city. It is not any reflection on them. If their interest is with the corporations and not with the public, they can not protect the public. It is impossible to serve two masters. The difficulty in that regard was distinctly announced about eighteen hundred years ago and has continued ever since. If they belong to these corporations they must serve them. Corporations allow no divided allegiance; they must own the whole man, not a part of him; and if these gentlemen are interested, it is a matter for them of course in accepting the trust to settle with their own consciences, but it is a matter for us to understand what possible influences may regulate and control them in any recommendations or suggestions they may make to us on these subjects.

Now, Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAY in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, on which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is entitled to the floor.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator's remarks, but I should like to make a request. The entire morning hour has been consumed before I have had any opportunity to call up the bill that was under discussion at the close of the morning hour yesterday. It is very embarrassing to me to remain here constantly every morning waiting for the Army bill to come up and having the morning hour taken up entirely by other matters; and I should like very much if the Senate would consent that, after the speech of the Senator from Oregon or after to-day—I will not ask the Senate to go on with the bill to-day—on Monday morning when the Army bill is reached Senators who feel an interest for or against it may make their remarks and have the bill disposed of. I hope the Senate will agree to that, and it will not interfere at all, except temporarily, with the Washington bill. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will agree to that.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Oregon will yield to me for a moment. I desire very much to extricate the Senate from the seeming antagonism which exists between these bills. I am willing to agree to almost anything that will not displace the Washington bill as the unfinished business.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not ask that. I am perfectly willing that that shall be laid before the Senate at every moment that is necessary so as to keep its place.

Mr. PLATT. I think the Senator is entitled to have his bill disposed of.

Mr. LOGAN. That is all I desire.

Mr. PLATT. I only desire that the Washington bill shall not be displaced.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator that whenever his bill is laid before the Senate I shall at once give way for that purpose, so that it shall not lose its place. I hope that understanding will be had.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator has had his bill before the Senate for a long while, and it seems to me he is entitled to complete it, but I do not wish the Washington bill to have the go-by.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I do not desire that, and I never do. I have no disposition, as Senators know, to interfere with any business of the Senate; but the bill in my charge was introduced in December, one of the first bills introduced in Congress; it was reported some time ago; and it does seem to me it ought to have a chance to be voted on at least; and that is all I desire. With that arrangement—and I am very much obliged to the Senator from Oregon for yielding for the purpose of making this proposition—I hope the Chair will put the question.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask the Senator from Oregon to yield to me for a moment that I may give notice of an amendment. I should like to have it read.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope unanimous consent will be asked for the proposition of the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Illinois state his proposition?

Mr. LOGAN. That on Monday after the morning business we proceed to the consideration of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Army, and continue it until it is disposed of, with a view not to displace any other measure that has the right of way; but at the conclusion of the morning hour that the unfinished business be laid before us and then temporarily laid aside to proceed with the Army efficiency bill until it is finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for his proposition. The Senate has heard it. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the proposition is agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very much obliged to the Senate.

Mr. GIBSON. I send up an amendment to the Army bill and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor yesterday I had discussed the area, population, and educational system of the proposed State and to some extent the character of its people. I now come to the financial ability of the Territory to maintain a State government. That is undoubted.

The last annual report of the Territorial auditor shows the Territory to be free from debt, with a balance in the treasury of $72,597.27 on the 1st day of July, 1885.

The Territory supports an insane asylum, a Territorial penitentiary, and a Territorial university, at an annual expenditure of about $70,000.

The assessed valuation of property within the Territory subject to taxation from 1876 to 1884 was as follows:

1876	$15,139,078
1877	17,281,182
1878	18,678,437
1879	21,021,832
1880	23,708,587
1881	25,786,415
1882	32,566,807
1883	44,107,567
1884	51,008,484

I present an official statement from Hon. T. M. Reed, Territorial auditor, showing the amount of taxable property and amount of Territorial tax levy, as returned by the several county assessors for the Territory of Washington, for the year ending February 1, 1884. This statement shows an aggregate valuation of taxable property within the Territory of $51,008,484; a tax levy of $12,743.39 for penitentiary purposes and $127,486.05 for Territorial purposes.

T. M. REED,
Territorial Auditor.

OFFICE OF TERRITORIAL AUDITOR,
Olympia, Wash., November 28, 1884.

By way of explanation it should be stated that the Territorial Legislature in 1883, passed a law taxing railroad companies on their gross earnings only, in lieu of a tax upon their property. A few of the county assessors in making the assessment for the year ending February 1, 1884, acting under legal advice, disregarded the law as unconstitutional and assessed railroad property within their counties. The large majority of them, however, I am informed, did not, and the value of railroad property in the Territory, with the exceptions mentioned, is not included in the above statement. The taxable value of railroad property within the Territory at the same valuation placed upon other property, would be not less than $7,500,000. This would swell the aggregate of assessable property in the Territory on the 1st of February, 1884, to $58,508,484.

Real property in Washington Territory, as a rule, is assessed from two-fifths to two-thirds of its value. The actual cash value of taxable property in the Territory at the present time is probably not less than $100,000,000.

The resources of the proposed State are varied and great, and when fully developed, will make it one of the most wealthy States in the Union. After the complete review of the resources of Washington Territory by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] I shall make a hasty summary of them only. The climate of Western Washington is delightful; cool in summer, mild in winter, and remarkably healthy. The isothermal line which passes through Northern Virginia runs northerly and westerly across the continent, being deflected rapidly to the north after crossing the Rocky Mountains, and strikes the Pacific Ocean about 200 miles north of the northern boundary line of Washington Territory. Along this line the mean average temperature is about 50°. The winters are so mild that as a rule in Western Washington and in the valleys of Eastern Washington stock run at large all winter without shelter, feeding upon the natural pasture.

Snow seldom falls to any considerable depth west of the Cascade Mountains, and when it does fall is soon melted by the warm winds from the Pacific. The mildness of the climate in winter is produced by the prevailing west wind, warmed by the heat from the tropics, which modify the climate as far inland as Western Dakota, and the Black Stream or Kuro Siwo, which, starting off the coast of Southeastern Asia, passes up the Asiatic coast and strikes the Pacific coast of North America at about 50° north latitude.

East of the Cascades the formation of the country differs materially from that of Western Washington. Forests are found only in the mountains and foot hills; the winters are colders and the summers drier than those of Western Washington, but the climate in both summer and winter is greatly modified by the westerly winds, tempered by the ocean current already mentioned, so that the winters are short and the nights in summer cool, with heavy dews.

This section is a portion of the great basin of the Columbia River, and consists mainly of high table-lands extending back from the Columbia River to the foot-hills of the Cascade range, the Blue Mountains, and the Bitter Root Mountains. A large portion of Eastern Washington is susceptible of successful cultivation and yields remarkable crops of wheat, which is the staple agricultural product. But in both Eastern and Western Washington oats, barley, and the grains and fruits grown in the temperate zones generally are also successfully raised. The berry of the wheat is large, plump, and compares favorably with the wheat grown in the best wheat-growing regions of the world. Portions of Eastern Washington are, however, too dry for successful cultivation without irrigation, but the soil is rich, and wherever water can be got upon it the labor of the farmer is rewarded with a bountiful harvest. Much that at one time was considered worthless has proved to be valuable agricultural lands.

As suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, Northern Idaho is a good agricultural country, and abounds in all the resources necessary to support a large population.

In recounting the natural advantages of Washington Territory, the system of water transportation afforded by Puget Sound and the Columbia River and its tributaries must not be overlooked. In fact any description of the Territory which did not include some account of the magnificent body of water popularly called Puget Sound, and which embraces the Straits of Juan de Fuca, Admiralty Inlet, Hood's Canal, and Puget Sound, and numerous bays, harbors, and inlets, each with a distinctive name, would be imperfect indeed. There is no other country upon the globe that possesses an inland sea which for beauty of scenery, for safety of navigation, for extent of unobstructed navigable channels, for numerous commodious harbors, and other advantages will at all compare with Puget Sound. It extends about 100 miles inland and 150 miles north and south, and has a surface area of 2,000 square miles and a shore line in Washington Territory of 1,984 miles. It has been very justly called "the Mediterranean of the Pacific."

From the Straits of Juan de Fuca, which, flowing east and west, separate the island of Vancouver from Washington Territory, the sound extends south in two arms, lying near together, some 70 to 90 miles into the heart of the Territory. The larger of these arms ends in a bay with narrow inlets, indenting the shore, as has been aptly said, "like the fingers of an open hand." North of the straits the waters of the sound wash the western shore of Washington and encircle hundreds of islands, and the coast is indented with innumerable bays and inlets.

The shores of Vancouver and of the British mainland bordering on the sound are similary indented, and everywhere throughout the vast archipelago the waters are deep, and in some places too deep to afford anchorage. The shores of the mainland and islands are covered with forests of pine, fir, and cedar, those on the mainland being the finest in the United States, and probably the finest upon the face of the globe. Along the shores are great saw-mills, at which vast quantities of lumber are manufactured and shipped to the ports of the Pacific coast of North, Central, and South America, the Hawaiian and other Pacific and South Sea islands, and to Australia.

Immense deposits of iron ore are found within convenient distance of its navigable waters, while in many places along the sound are found extensive beds of coal of an excellent quality, a number of which are already profitably worked, and the products of which are shipped to Oregon, California, and Eastern Washington. Numerous rivers, navigable for varying distances, discharge into this internal sea, which extend the magnificent system of water navigation of the sound farther into the interior in many directions, and furnish cheap and convenient transportation for the timber, coal, and iron, while the bottoms along the banks of these rivers, enriched by the contributions of the neighboring mountains for centuries, yield amazing returns in oats, hops, hay, and vegetables for the labor of the agriculturist.

Along its shores, "beautiful for situation," convenient to its great and growing commerce, are situated important cities and towns, among the principal of which are Port Townsend, Seattle, Tacoma, and Olympia. The Olympic range faces the Straits of Juan de Fuca near the coast, and affords charming mountain views; and the Cascade range running up through the Territory into British Columbia introduces into the scene the grandeur of its lofty snow-peaks, among which are Mount Baker, the highest peak in the northern part of the range, Mount Saint Helens, Mount Adams, and Mount Rainier, or Mount Tacoma, as it is now called, 12,300 feet above the level of the sea, "with its three white peaks mounting above the clouds."

The importance of the shipping interests of Washington Territory will appear from the following statistics:

The shipping of the Puget Sound customs district already exceeds that of four-fifths of the customs districts of the United States. During the year ending June 30, 1885, 169 vessels were documented at the custom-house at Port Townsend, of which number 80 were steam-vessels and 89 sail-vessels, the aggregate tonnage of which was 47,657 tons. During the year ending June 30, 1885, 2,130 vessels, aggregating 930,374 tons, were entered and cleared at the custom-house, of which 178 were coastwise and 1,952 were foreign vessels.

The proposed early completion of the Cascade Branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad will open a direct line of transportation between Eastern and Western Washington, and provide a shorter, and it is to be hoped a less expensive route to tide water upon Puget Sound for the surplus agricultural products of Eastern Washington and for supplying the lumber and coal of Western Washington to the people of the eastern portion of the Territory, and will bind the two sections by a community of interest and good-fellowship. The most fertile fancy can scarcely picture the great future which awaits the Pacific Northwest. New experiments and a more thorough investigation of the character of its soil and the extent of its resources every year result in fresh discoveries. The extent of agricultural lands, the fertility of the soil, and the variety of the resources of Eastern Washington are so much greater than were supposed a few years ago that the Eastern Washington Territory of to-day may be said to be, as compared with that region as known ten years since, a newly discovered country.

The advantages and resources of this favored section were thus summed up by Governor Newell, of Washington Territory, in his message to the Legislative Assembly in 1882.

I will pass the extract to the Secretary and ask him to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Forty-five millions of acres of timber, coal, pasture, and mountain lands; mines of precious metals; quarries of limestone, marble, granite, slate, sandstone, and beds of mica; ocean front and inland salt seas; many lakes and rivers, affording thousands of miles of navigable waters—all alive with an hundred varieties of fish, some of them of great value; water powers; a climate of even temperature and healthful; grand scenery of water and mountains; facilities for manufacturing the staples from our own material—wood, iron, wool, and hides; maritime opportunities unsurpassed for internal, coastwise, and foreign commerce, in a line to absorb the trade of Alaska in fish, fur, cedar, and gold; to obtain the largest share from Asia in coffee, teas, opium, porcelain, silks, and ivory. All of these are our resources and advantages which will straightway place Washington Territory in the forefront along with the most prosperous countries on the globe.

Mr. DOLPH. The geographical position of the Territory is one of great commercial importance. It is situated upon what, I believe, is destined to be the great line of the world's commerce. Puget Sound, with its magnificent harbors, is already the western terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad, which has its eastern terminus upon the navigable waters of Lake Superior, and is connected with the extensive system of water transportation on the great lakes and the River Saint Lawrence, and with competing railroad lines to the Atlantic seaboard, and all along the line across the continent is already connected with numerous branches and feeders extending into the fertile valleys and rich mineral regions of the richest and most productive portion of the continent west of the Mississippi River. The shorter distance, as compared with other routes, between Puget Sound and the principal ports of China and Japan, and the more favorable trade winds prevailing upon the direct route between those ports will, without doubt, and that, too, at no distant day, command for the ports of Puget Sound their share of the rich and extensive commerce of China and Japan.

In a speech delivered by me in the Senate on the 7th of March, 1884, I referred to some statistics to show the present and rapidly-growing coastwise and foreign commerce of the Pacific coast. Without recapitulating what I then said, I will be pardoned for referring to it. Those statistics show that the value of the foreign commerce of a single port upon the Pacific coast—the port of San Francisco—for the year ending September 30, 1883, was nearly as much as the average foreign commerce of the United States for the decade ending September 30, 1830. I then said what I ask the Secretary to read:

The Secretary read as follows:

The growth of foreign commerce upon the Pacific coast for many years to come will be much larger proportionately than the growth of the whole commerce of the United States, and it is not improbable that within a single decade the foreign commerce of the Pacific coast will be equal to one-third of the present commerce of the United States, and that a quarter of a century hence the commerce of the Pacific coast will equal in amount and value the entire commerce of the United States in 1873.

The Pacific coast at present is at a disadvantage in marketing its wheat in Europe, as it is compelled to ship it around the Horn, but it is nearer by the breadth of a continent to the markets of the old East than are the Atlantic ports; and the time is not far distant when it will find a market for its wheat and flour in Asia and the islands of the Pacific. There is a large and constantly increasing shipment of flour from the Pacific coast to China, and well-informed persons assert that this trade will steadily increase until China alone will furnish a market for a large portion of the surplus wheat raised upon the coast.

Various causes have conspired to direct the commerce of the Pacific coast with China, Japan, and the Sandwich Islands to San Francisco. Chief among these causes have been the transcontinental railroad line terminating at that port, the steamship line between that place and the ports of China, and the monopoly of the sugar trade with the Sandwich Islands by her merchants. Since the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, opening a channel of commerce across the continent from ship navigation upon the Columbia River and Puget Sound with the great commercial centers of the East, Portland, Astoria, and the Puget Sound ports will become competitors with San Francisco for this trade. The number of sailing vessels engaged in this trade will no doubt be largely increased, and the necessities of commerce will demand better facilities for the future. The Northern Pacific Railroad Company will be compelled by the necessities of its business to place or aid in placing a line of steamships in the Asiatic trade to connect with its road.

The trade of San Francisco will not decrease, but the trade of Puget Sound and the Columbia River will largely increase. The advantages are decidedly in favor of the latter ports in competing for this trade. The distance between Canton and Port Townsend, the port of entry for the Puget Sound collection district, and between Canton and the Columbia River, is several hundred miles less than the distance between Canton and San Francisco. And the route from Canton to the Columbia and to the Straits of Juan de Fuca is in the direction of the trade-winds. It has been averred that the Pacific coast is greatly interested in the proposed interoceanic canal; and it is true that any work which will shorten the distance and lessen the cost of transportation between the Pacific coast and the markets of Europe will be of great advantage to the coast; but the Pacific coast is far from being dependent upon such a canal for its commercial prosperity.

The commercial outlook of the Pacific is westward. Every year its commercial relations with Europe will grow comparatively less important, and its commercial relations with its trans-Pacific neighbors will become greater. The continent of Asia and the islands of the Pacific, with their millions of inhabitants, with their rich and valuable commerce, are separated from us only by the open sea, over which steamships come and go with regularity and safety. It seems probable that everything imported into the United States from those countries consumed west of the Rocky Mountains, and everything which will bear railroad transportation across the continent, will be imported through the ports of the Pacific coast.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, the prospect for the early opening of an interoceanic canal, so far as I am able to judge, is not so bright as it then appeared. I think, however, notwithstanding statements to the contrary, that the Panama Canal will be completed. It is hardly possible to estimate the influence of the opening of this canal upon every industry of the Pacific coast. Our wheat, flour, and fish are now, and for some time to come, will be mainly marketed in Europe, and are shipped around Cape Horn, while our market for lumber, with inconsiderable exceptions, is confined to the Pacific coast of North, Central, and South America, the Hawaiian and other Pacific and South Sea Islands. The completion of the Panama Canal will so shorten the distance and lessen the risk of the voyage from the Pacific coast of North America to the continent of Europe that a great reduction in the cost of transportation will necessarily follow, resulting in the opening of new and extensive markets for our lumber. To the extent that the cost of transportation is reduced the value of the fish, oil, furs, and lumber of Alaska, and of the wheat, flour, fish, fruit, lumber, hops, and wool of California, Oregon, and Washington, will be increased; the labor of the producer will be better rewarded, enterprise stimulated, and the country developed. It will also place water transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, in competition with transportation by rail, a competition which can not be prevented by pools, traffic agreements, or consolidations.

It has been stated, upon apparently good authority, that the wheat traffic of California, Oregon, and Washington Territory with Europe gives employment to four hundred and forty sailing vessels going around Cape Horn. The average voyage of each ship is about four months, which the opening of the Panama Canal would reduce to one-half the time.

It is not now my purpose to discuss the merits of any route for a ship-canal, or the relative merits of a ship-canal and a ship-railway. The Nicaragua Canal, if constructed, would be in the neighborhood of 500 miles farther north than the Panama Canal, and consequently would bring the Pacific coast of North America a thousand miles nearer to the markets of Europe and the Atlantic coast, while the construction and successful operation of the proposed Tehauntepec Ship Railway, the proposed location for which is still eight hundred miles north of the Nicaraguan route, would still further shorten the voyage from ports of California, Oregon, and Washington Territory over sixteen hundred miles over the Nicaraguan route, and to that extent would probably still further lessen the cost of transportation.

About one year ago I received by mail a printed argument against the construction of the Nicaragua Canal by the Government, the ground of objection being that if constructed and successfully operated it would destroy the investment made to construct the Panama Canal, and in a great measure the investment of the United States in transcontinental railroads, and likewise the large investments of our citizens in these enterprises. It is a sufficient answer to the argument to say neither the Government nor the people of the United States are under obligations to protect investors in the Panama Canal, and that the aid granted by Congress to the transcontinental railroads was not granted for the sake of the investment but to open up new lines of transportation and develop the country, not for the benefit of the Government so much as for the benefit of the people at large, and that neither the Government nor investors in those roads have any just claim to protection at the expense of the interests of the general public.

Compared with the rapid growth of some other Northwestern States and Territories, Washington Territory and Oregon until quite recently have made rather slow progress. In the early days of the settlement of that region the long, toilsome journey across the continent required to reach it from the Mississippi Valley was a great obstacle to immigration, although thousands braved the hardships and perils of the journey, became the pioneers of American civilization there, settled the question of the title to the country by actual occupation, and laid the foundations of its present prosperity. California, when gold was discovered within her borders and fortunes were being made in a day, drew largely from the population of the Territory of Oregon, which embraced what afterward became Washington Territory, and a constant drain has been going on for the last twenty-five years from the population of Oregon and Washington Territory to Idaho and Montana Territories. After the completion of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads California, with her mild climate, rich mines, fertile soil, and diversified industries, separated from Oregon and Washington by a disagreeable sea voyage, proved an obstruction upon the principal line of travel between the outside world and Oregon and Washington, and largely absorbed the immigration to the Pacific coast.

The growth of the Territory in wealth and population has, however, been continuous and permanent. At present the North Pacific coast is feeling the impetus given to it by connection with the railroad system of the East and increased immigration. During the last three years, stimulated by the opening of new lines of transportation, including the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad to the Columbia River, the development of her great natural resources has been greatly accelerated. But the increase of population has been in a healthy way, and the stimulus of her industries has not been unnatural. The cities and towns have prospered, but not to the detriment, as is sometimes the case, of the agricultural and other producing interests, for they too have correspondingly advanced, and her mining and other industries have made satisfactory progress.

The increase of population and the general growth of the country give assurance that the prosperity is not spasmodic, but is destined to continue. The era of improvement has overtaken the country; railroads are now being built and others projected which will within a few years bring every productive region not now furnished with facilities for transportation within the easy reach of market. The day of uncertainty as to the future of this section—if there ever was such a day in its history—is past; the country has become known and has been made so accessible that it will hereafter receive a fair share of the emigration from the older settled portions of the Union and from Europe.

In the language of another:

That Northwest, therefore, so far off till now, has become our next-door neighbor, and is as near to New York as Monday is to Friday; where were heard, mainly, only the dashings of her rivers in the primeval stillness of her wilderness, are heard the puffing of steamers and whistle of locomotives, and clatter of mills and bustle of trade, and the glad sounds of farm life and the winsome music of children.

A very large majority of the people of Washington Territory desire the admission of the Territory as a State of the Union. In fact, I believe I hazard nothing by stating that they are practically unanimous in favor of admission, and they have done all that could be done to signify that desire to Congress. Both political parties at their Territorial conventions have resolved in favor of admission. Without waiting for an enabling act of Congress, the Territorial Legislature at the session of 1877–'78 made provision for the holding of a Territorial convention to adopt a constitution.

The convention was held and a constitution framed and submitted to the people, and, although it contained a number of objectionable provisions, it was adopted by a two-thirds vote of all the votes polled. The Legislature of the Territory at the session of 1883 adopted an earnest memorial to Congress, praying for admission; and at the last session adopted a similar memorial. The people of Northern Idaho are also practically unanimous in their desire to have Northern Idaho included within the boundaries of the new State.

There were very few settlers in that portion of Washington Territory east of the Cascade Mountains, now Eastern Washington, Idaho, and Western Montana prior to 1861. In consequence of the discovery of gold in what is now Northern Idaho during that year, in that and the succeeding year there was a considerable immigration from Western Washington, Oregon, and California to that mining region. During the latter year a movement was inaugurated for the organization of a Territory out of that portion of Washington Territory lying east of the Columbia River. The matter received the favorable consideration of Congress, but instead of the Columbia River being made the western boundary of Idaho, it is said through the influence of the Delegate from Washington, the one hundred and seventeenth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich was substituted. Idaho was organized by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1863. The boundaries fixed for the Territory included but a narrow strip of land west of the Bitter Root Mountains susceptible of settlement and cultivation.

In the year 1864 the Territory of Montana was organized out of a part of Idaho, with its western boundary the crest of the Bitter Root Mountains, leaving the northern portion of Idaho only about 40 miles in width. A considerable portion of that consists of spurs of the Bitter Root Mountains, not suitable for cultivation. The division line between Washington and Idaho was an unnatural one. North Idaho is a part of the basin of the Columbia River and naturally belongs to Washington Territory. The people of Northern Idaho were dissatisfied with their situation and first sought relief by endeavoring to procure the formation of a new Territory to embrace that portion of Washington Territory east of the Columbia River and North Idaho. Failing in this they sought annexation to the Territory of Washington, and this effort has been persisted in by petitions and memorials to Congress.

The Legislature of Washington Territory in the act authorizing the calling of a convention to form a State constitution, hereinbefore referred to, invited delegates from the northern counties of Idaho to participate in the convention, with a view of including those counties within the new State. These counties chose delegates who represented them in the convention. The constitution framed by the convention included within the boundaries of the proposed State the three northern counties of Idaho and made provision for the submission of such constitution to both the people of Washington and North Idaho. As has been said, the people of Washington Territory adopted this constitution by more than two-thirds of all the votes polled, while in North Idaho only 34 votes out of 800 were polled against it. The memorial adopted by the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, at its session of 1882, to Congress, asking an enabling act to form a State and adopt a constitution, asked to include within the boundaries of the new State the northern counties of Idaho, and the lower house of the Idaho Legislature, at the session of 1882 and 1883, adopted a memorial asking that whenever Washington should be admitted the northern counties of Idaho should become a part of the new State. The question of the annexation of North Idaho to Washington Territory when admitted as a State was again submitted to the people of North Idaho at the general election of 1880, and 1,216 votes were polled for annexation and only 7 against it. The Territorial Legislature of Idaho again at the last session passed a memorial praying for the annexation of North Idaho to Washington Territory. In a petition of a committee of citizens of North Idaho, styling themselves "corresponding committee," the reasons for desiring that North Idaho should be annexed to the State of Washington are stated with great force and particularity as follows:

The reasons for desiring that North Idaho be annexed to the State of Washington are:

First. The union of North and South Idaho is, and always has been, disastrous to all the material interests of the people of the northern part of the Territory. If the imaginary line now constituting the western boundary of North Idaho were abrogated and this section restored to its original and natural position as a part of Washington, the value of the property of her citizens would be increased by hundreds of thousands of dollars. Immigration now stops within Washington Territory and crosses into Idaho with reluctance. With agricultural resources unsurpassed, except in extent, the development of these resources is retarded beyond a present power of computation by reason of our isolated condition consequent upon a political connection with a section with which we are as practically separated as from any State in the Union. To remain thus permanently severed from the basin of the Columbia, of which we are naturally a part, is and will always continue to be absolutely ruinous to our prosperity.

Second. North and South Idaho are separated by natural boundaries. Between the two is a mountain range impassable, except on horseback or on foot over rugged mountain trails in the summer and in the winter except on snowshoes. There never has been a wagon-road and never can be a practicable one between the two. The Salmon River Mountains, which constitutes this barrier, are at least 60 miles in width, extending east and west, across the entire Territory.

Third. The only routes of travel between the two, by private or public conveyance, except as before stated, is by a wide detour westward through Washington Territory and the State of Oregon, over the Blue Mountains, or still farther, by water and rail to Portland and San Francisco, through Washington Territory and the States of Oregon and California, via the Central Pacific road. Within the limits of the Territory there is no communication between the two sections except by mountain trail, as before stated.

Fourth. Our remoteness from the seat of the Idaho Territorial government deprives us of all the protection which a government should afford to every section of its domain. North Idaho, with a comparatively small area, is the present home of a large number of Indians. In it are the Nez Percé, Cœur d'Alene, Pend d'Oreille, a part of Kootenai, permanently, and the Spokane roam through the northern portion thereof. There are no prospects of these tribes being removed to other localities. We are subject, therefore, in the future, as we have been in the past, to sudden and cruel savage outbreaks. When the Indian war under Chief Joseph broke upon our people in 1877 we appealed to the governor, an energetic and faithful executive, for aid, but his reply was, "That he had no arms that he could spare for so long a distance, and that aid could reach us from other sources sooner than from Boisé, our capital." General Howard attempted to aid us by a command sent from South Idaho through the nearest and most accessible route. This command, under a brave and energetic officer, pushed forward with the utmost dispatch until it reached the southern base of the Salmon River Mountains, within 80 miles of our people. It sought to make a wagon-road and cross this barrier, but was obliged to turn back before the difficulties of this mountain range. Although within 80 miles of the point where men, women, and children were being massacred with savage cruelty this command was obliged to leave our people to their fate and to come to our rescue, if at all, by passing through Oregon and Washington, a distance of not less that 600 miles.

Governor Ferry, of Washington Territory, came at once to our aid, and though beyond the jurisdiction of his Territory loaned us arms and munitions of war. Thus this savage warfare was staid by aid from the Territory to which we ask to be annexed, and could naturally come from no other source. What occurred in 1877 may occur at any time in the future. The government in South Idaho can only draw a revenue from our taxable property, while it can afford us no protection from impending danger. The capital of the Territory was removed from Lewiston, in North Idaho, to Boisé, in South Idaho, in 1875. Since that time, a period of seventeen years, no Territorial officer has ever been within the limits of the Territory sought to be annexed, and none have had any actual practical knowledge of our condition. This has not been the result of a want of energy or a lack of interest on the part of these gentlemen in the welfare of our people. It is simply the result of the difficulties of intercourse between the two sections which nature has made nearly insurmountable.

Fifth. The political union of these two sections of Idaho renders it necessary to travel over the above-described routes from this northern section to the capital at a great expense and at great distance by stage, and in the winter season at considerable danger to life and health, while the union of North Idaho with the State of Washington would make access to the seat of government expeditious, easy, and convenient by rail or river navigation.

Sixth. Between North and South Idaho there is and can be no commercial intercourse. Neither has products which find a market in the other, and no routes of transportation from either section to the market of the world passes through the other. The products of North Idaho have hitherto passed westward to the Pacific and will in the future take the same course unless a portion pass over the North Pacific road to Eastern markets.

Seventh. No material or political interest of South Idaho will be affected by the annexation of North Idaho to Washington. All her resources could be harmoniously developed. It is claimed by those opposed to annexation that the severance of North Idaho would leave the Territory subject to Mormon rule. This plea is fallacious and designed simply to prejudice the minds of those not acquainted with the facts. Bear Lake County, in the extreme southeastern corner of the Territory, is the only one where the Mormon influence is dominant. In Oneida County, joining Bear Lake on the west, the political power of the Mormon and anti-Mormon, known there as the Gentile influence, has always been and now is nearly equally divided, so nearly equal that the county officers and representatives in the Territorial Legislature have been about equally divided. Cassia County, joining Oneida on the west, has a considerable, but not a controlling, Mormon vote. These three counties, located in the extreme southeastern portion of the Territory, contain the entire Mormon strength. In the counties of Owyhee, Ada, Washington, Boisé, Lemhi, Alturas, and Custer the Mormons have no power whatever.

At the last census, in 1880, Idaho Territory had a population of 32,713, of these North Idaho had 6,983 and South Idaho 25,730. At that time the Mormon population in Idaho did not exceed 7,000. Since then there has been no great increase of Mormons within the Territory, but the discovery of gold in the Wood River country in Alturas and Custer Counties has brought into the Territory, according to the most reliable estimates, not less than 20,000 people. Of this increase nearly all are anti-Mormon. In South Idaho then, at this time, the relative population of what is known as Mormon and Gentile is 7,000 of the former and 38,682 Gentile, or in the ratio less than 1 to 5 in favor of the anti-Mormon influence.

Eighth. It has been claimed, as we are informed, that the annexation of North Idaho to the State of Washington would make the latter unstately. An eminent statesman of our country, speaking of the boundaries of the States forming our Union, has said that the boundaries of the States should be such as God and nature have established. We presume that boundaries not conforming to this principle are not desirable. The boundaries of Idaho, as to all north of the Salmon River Mountains, are contrary to this principle and unnaturally sever us from Washington and unite us to Idaho. The truth is that the present awkward shape of Idaho and the consequent unfortunate condition of our section is the result of political intrigue of aspirants for office. Its present boundaries, as far as North Idaho is concerned, were established without the knowledge and against the wishes of the people directly interested, and since their establishment our efforts to restore our section of the Territory to its former place have been constantly adhered to. We believe that all such political aspirations have been gratified and that no citizen, either public or private, will be injured by the desired change.

Were the present eastern boundary of Washington Territory at the crest of the Bitter Root Mountains including North Idaho and southward to the crest of the Salmon River range as a southern boundary, the natural boundaries would be restored and the entire Columbia River basin would be included within the State of Washington. This would leave the Territory of Idaho of a nearly rectangular shape, with all sections easily accessible from its center and with an area of 55,000 square miles, larger in extent than the State of Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Mississippi, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, or Wisconsin, while the State of Washington would have an area of 90,000 square miles, smaller than the Territory of Arizona, Dakota, Montana, New Mexico, Wyoming, or the State of California, Colorado, Nevada, Texas, or Oregon.

Adversely to annexation, no reference is made by the committee to the people of North Idaho. Their condition is entirely ignored. It is this unfortunate disregard of all our rights and claims that has reduced us to a condition of political vassalage. We earnestly appeal to the honorable members of Congress to do us the justice to carefully examine our grievances. We feel it to be our duty to say that we are now, and for years have been, most unjustly misrepresented in Congress. We can only look for relief to members of other States and Territories. There is now a Territorial debt, a part of which we are under obligations to pay, of about $60,000. This is not payable until 1885 or most of it would have been paid at this time. We are ready to assume our proportion of this debt, and if indeed our "ransom can only be bought with a price," we will, if required, pay any proportion thereof that Congress may impose upon us. We most respectfully ask that our wishes may not be ignored. We were originally a part of Washington Territory; we were unjustly severed from it and we can only be restored to political and commercial prosperity by being annexed to and becoming a part of the State of Washington.

I now present as part of my remarks also a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington, adopted at the session of 1883:

MEMORIAL.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The people of the Territory of Washington, by their Legislative Assembly, respectfully, but urgently, protest against the further continuance by Congress of the so-called Territorial government, a new creation of Congress, unknown to the Constitution of the United States, the only warrant for such a political anomaly in our institution being based upon a custom sanctioned so long that it has grown to be regarded as the necessary method whereby territory of the nation can be prepared for future States of the Federal Union. Earnestly this people pray that Congress will remove their political disabilities, and that they may enjoy the constitutional guarantee of a government republican in form where the government derives all of its just powers from the consent of the governed. The settlers of this Territory have brought hither to establish a State the necessary intelligence, loyalty, and patriotic motive. It is conceded that they possess the necessary qualifications, but still are they denied the first and most essential element of American citizenship. They dare not participate in the selection of the Chief Magistrate of the nation; they are denied the right to elect their own officers; they can not sue a citizen of one of the States in the Federal courts because they are not recognized as citizens of a State; they are denied representation in the Congress of the United States; they can not make their own laws; they are mere dependents upon your honorable body, who claim to adopt rules for their government under an implied power—that you make rules and regulations as to the disposition of the Territory and other property of the Government. In fact, every relation of such a government to the Congress of the United States exhibits a dependence as humiliating as that so terribly denounced in that grandest of indictments, drafted by the immortal Jefferson, arraigning the Crown of Great Britain for withholding popular rights from our ancestors. Our people are a Commonwealth. We are a State, though denied such name. As a State, as a people, as a community we are entitled to demand that the Congress of the United States guarantee to us a republican form of government. The State, and people of a State, are but equivalent forms of expression, and it is not disrespectful when we urge as the paramount duty of Congress the guarantees to us of a republican form of government. In urgency of which we respectfully submit—

First. That the people are sufficient in numbers to successfully maintain a State government. The population of Washington Territory largely exceeds that of many of the States when admitted. It is not less than 125,000, and well-informed and observant persons place it as high as 150,000. The immigration now and for the past year has been unexampled in the history of the growth of American States and Territories. It is also worthy of remark that transition from Territorial vassalage to Statehood and sovereignty has always been followed by renewed growth; and surely the circumstances and present surroundings of this Territory assure that increased prosperity, importance, and wealth. We beg to refer to the admission of other States. California was admitted with a population of 92,597. Colorado, at the census preceding admission, numbered 39,864. Florida, at the census following admission, had a population of 87,445, while at the previous census it numbered only 54,477. Kansas came in with 107,206, Iowa, at the census before admission, had 43,112. Nebraska, at the census before admission, 28,847; in 1860, 122,993. Nevada, before admission, 6,857; subsequent, 42,491; and in 1880 boasted a population of 62,666. Oregon was admitted in 1859, and at the census of the subsequent year had a population of 52,455. These statistics establish the fact that our population greatly outnumbers that of numerous successful applicants for Statehood. By all the precedents Congress is concluded upon this proposition. Washington Territory possesses the requisite population.

Second. Our people are amply able to maintain a State government. This is demonstrated by a comparison of the valuation of taxable property in this Territory with those of several States in the Federal Union:

Washington Territory, in 1883	$44,107,567
Colorado, in 1880	43,072,648
Florida	29,471,227
Nevada	29,564,675
Oregon	46,422,817

In the support of an insane asylum, a Territorial penitentiary, and a university the Territory annually expends over $60,000. With the exception of the trifling contribution by the United States for the expenses of trying United States causes, and the salaries of three judges, the district attorney, and marshal, the people pay the expenses of their courts. The expenses of legislation are partially paid by the United States; the people elect the members, but their laws are subject to Congressional approval. The governor and secretary are paid by the United States, but how cordially would the people pay their salaries for the democratic privilege of electing their own rulers. All these expenses are derived from taxation for Territorial purposes in addition to our county, school, road, and municipal taxes. The Territory, devoid of sovereignty, owns no property and can not hold any from which income can be derived, and thus it is the tax-payers are called upon to bear this burden to maintain a government not of their own making.

Third. Our great natural resources, our future wealth demand such recognition, and they are entitled to Congressional representation to secure their development. With requisite population in numbers, who have demonstrated their ability to maintain government, we pray that our disabilities may be removed and we be restored to those rights which belong to American birthright and citizenship, the right to select our own rulers, to make our own laws. We ask for nothing that is not your duty to confer. We pray only to be allowed to consider ourselves citizens of the United States of America, and, as in right, duty, and good conscience, we will ever pray.

Passed the council, November 21, 1883.

SEWALL TRUAX,
President of Council.

Passed the house, November 24, 1883.

E. C. FERGUSON,
Speaker of the House.

Approved, November 28, 1883.

WM. A. NEWELL.

I present also a memorial of the Legislature of Washington Territory, adopted at the last session of the Legislative Assembly of that Territory, praying for admission into the Union as a State.

Memorial praying for the admission of the Territory of Washington to the Union of States.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington, respectfully represent that Washington Territory has a population of 175,000, capable and desirous of governing themselves; that the wealth and natural resources of the Territory are sufficient to maintain a grand and prosperous State: Therefore your memorialists do respectfully urge your honorable body to admit the Territory of Washington to the Union of States at the earliest possible date.

Passed the house of representatives, February 3, 1886.

R. O. DUNBAR,
Speaker of the House.

Passed the council, February 3, 1886.

B. B. DAY,
President of the Council.

Approved, February 4, 1886.

WATSON C. SQUIRE,
Governor.

[SEAL.]

I also present the preamble and resolutions of the Walla Walla Board of Trade, in favor of the annexation of that portion of Idaho known as the "Panhandle," to Washington Territory:

Whereas it is represented that the proposition to annex the Panhandle of Idaho to Washington Territory is a political movement for the benefit of only one party; and

Whereas such representation is, in our opinion, without foundation in fact; and

Wheras such annexation is demanded by the voice of a large majority of the people of Washington and Idaho Territories without regard to politics: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the opinion of the Walla Walla Board of Trade that the annexation of such Panhandle of Idaho to Washington Territory is demanded by the business interests of both Territories and by the natural geographical and community division of the Northwest, and such movement will result in the mutual benefit of both said Territories; and

Be it further resolved, That the president and secretary transmit authenticated copies of these resolutions (one to each) to Hon. J. N. DOLPH and Hon. J. H. MITCHELL, Senators from Oregon, and Hon. CHARLES S. VOORHEES, Delegate from Washington Territory; Hon. JOHN HAILEY, Delegate from Idaho Territory, and the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, with the request that Congress pass the bill for that purpose without delay.

Passed the Walla Walla Board of Trade March 4, 1886.

H. P. ISAACS, President.

Attest:

H. D. CHAPMAN, Secretary.

I also present the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho, passed at its last session, and which is as follows:

Council joint memorial No. 2.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the council and house of representatives of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho, respectfully represent that all of that portion of said Territory which comprises the counties of Idaho, Nez Percé, Shoshone, and Kootenai, and is included in the boundaries hereinafter set forth and constituting what is known as North Idaho, is situated in relation to the southern and southeastern portion of said Territory as to render their political union impracticable, for the reason that nature has divided them by a high and rugged range of mountains, over which there is no road except such as will admit of the passage of riding and pack animals, and this only for about six months of the year. During the remaining six months the snow is so deep as to cut off all communication between said sections except by telegraph or travel by a circuitous route through Washington Territory, across the Umatilla Indian reservation, and through the State of Oregon, a distance of some 700 miles, this being the shortest route by which the people of the north can reach Boisé City, the capital of the Territory, except it be on horseback or on snowshoes.

Politically the two sections are united, but socially, commercially, and geographically they never can be.

We, your memorialists, therefore respectfully pray that when the Territory of Washington is admitted as a State into the Union all that portion of the Territory of Idaho hereinafter more particularly described be attached to and made a part of said State of Washington, to wit: Commencing at a point in the middle channel of Snake River, at the northwest corner of Washington County, in Idaho Territory, thence easterly along the northern boundary line of said Washington County to where said boundary line crosses the Salmon River range of mountains; thence easterly along the summit of said Salmon River range of mountains to the eastern boundary line of said Idaho County; thence northerly along the eastern boundary line of said Idaho County to summit of the Bitter Root range of mountains; thence in a general northerly course along the summit of the Bitter Root range of mountains to the thirty-ninth meridian line, west longitude from Washington, D. C.; thence north along said meridian to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude; thence west along said parallel to the western boundary line of Idaho Territory; and thence southerly along said western boundary line to the place of beginning.

And we would further ask that in the event of the disintegration of the part of Idaho Territory mentioned, that the common debt be adjusted and provision made for the support of such convicts as are now in the Territorial penitentiary, and for the support of the persons adjudged insane in said counties of Idaho, Kootenai, Shoshone, and Nez Percé.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

D. W. FOUCH, Speaker.
CHAS. A. WOOD,
President of the Council.

I hereby certify that the within council joint memorial No. 2 originated in the council during the thirteenth session.

J. W. CUNNINGHAM,
Chief Clerk of the Council.

Practically the bill now under consideration adopts the boundary recommended by this memorial. There is a slight variation, but the boundary described in the bill is the one agreed upon by the Delegates of the two Territories in the House, and it is the same as is contained in the bill for the annexation of Northern Idaho to Washington Territory which has passed the House at the present session and is now before the Senate Committee on Territories.

I also refer to the resolutions adopted by the Republican Territorial convention of 1884, and read the following resolution in regard to the annexation of Northern Idaho to Washington Territory:

Resolved, That the wishes of the people of North Idaho in regard to annexation to Washington Territory should be faithfully and justly represented. It is a question of local importance with the people of that section, and demands recognition and support in proportion to the unanimity of their expression of that subject.

Also, I read upon the same subject a resolution adopted by the Democratic Territorial convention of the same year, which is as follows:

Resolved, That we recognize the full right, justness, importance, and final result of the claim of our citizens of Northern Idaho in their annexation views; and here in open convention, backed by an honest Democracy, we pledge to our northern neighbors a willingness and co-operation on our part to accede to their wishes on this proposition in a mutuality of feeling that shall bind us together fraternally now and sow the seeds of eternal friendship when the separation may come; and we ask our northern friends to accept this pledge in the honesty of its intention and with the full assurance that it is based upon the promise of a permanent, resident political organization and not the imported vibrations of homeless, faithless, wandering political mendicants.

Having received what purported to be the proceedings of a mass-meeting of people of the Cœur d'Alene mining region, protesting against the annexation of Northern Idaho to Washington, I communicated with the Delegate from Idaho Territory to learn to what extent in his judgment the proceedings of that meeting represented the people of the Territory, and in reply to my inquiry I received a letter signed by the Delegate from Idaho and the Delegate from Washington Territory, which I will ask to have read.

The Secretary read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our recent conversation touching the sentiment of the people of North Idaho on the proposition to annex that portion of Idaho to Washington Territory, we have to say that in our judgment the great majority earnestly desire the enactment of such a law.

The suggestion, which comes from the Cœur d'Alene mining region, to annex that portion of North Idaho which lies north of the forty-seventh parallel to Montana voices the desire of a very inconsiderable portion of the community. This suggestion comes from a small portion of a mining population which, as is well known, is migratory and unsettled. It may embrace possibly from two hundred to five hundred people. From no other quarter has any intimation of such a desire reached us.

There can be no doubt as to the propriety of the annexation of that part of Idaho Territory lying north of the Salmon River range of mountains to the Territory of Washington. Every interest of the inhabitants thereof will be properly subserved by such annexation.

We have the honor to be, your obedient servants,

C. S. VOORHEES.
JOHN HAILEY.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senate.

Mr. DOLPH. I also submit a letter received from C. T. P Bass, who signs himself "Chairman Board of County Commissioners, Shoshone County" (the county in which this meeting of miners was held), and refers to the meeting, in which he says that the proceedings of the meeting do not reflect the sentiments of that county:

MURRAY, IDAHO, March 11, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Difference of opinions having been given as to the preferences of our people in the matter of division and annexation, I take the liberty to ask your attention to the following points, namely:

The unanimous expressions of all classes of our people, prior to an agitation originating with a few old Montana politicians, has been favorable to annexation to Washington. You, no doubt, remember that resolutions were passed by both political conventions of the Territory in 1884; also a memorial by the last Legislature favoring and requesting segregation of the Panhandle and annexation of same to Washington. The only newspaper published in this, the Cœur d'Alene, mining region has earnestly supported above plan until the passage of resolutions and address to Congress by a public meeting held at this place a few weeks since.

While the resolutions and address were adopted at a meeting called at the instance of W. H. Clagett, former Delegate in Congress from Montana, assisted by Alexander Meyhew, former president of council of Montana, and others, and petitions numerously signed have been forwarded asking annexation to Montana, I assert as my opinion that a large majority of not only this Shoshone County, but also of Kootenai County, are sternly opposed to either annexation to Montana or to remaining in Idaho, and are by a large majority favorable to affiliation with Washington.

There is a Territorial objection to annexation to Montana that I have not heard mentioned by our local agitators or by the press: it is almost universally conceded that Dakota is too large with an area of 149,000 square miles. Montana now has 146,000, but with this portion of Idaho her area would not be less than 160,000 square miles. We would then be in danger of another separation and being attached to some other local government.

I earnestly solicit your support of the Voorhees bill (or the bill that has already passed the House) whenever it may come before the Senate for passage, and I have no doubt you will accommodate a good majority of the residents of the segregated Territory.

I am, yours, very truly,

C. T. P. BASS,
Chairman Board of County Commissioners, Shoshone County.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

P.S.—Petitions would have been forwarded representing above sentiment, but for the opinion that they were not required and would not assist us. A large number of signatures could be secured.

BASS.

I will also read an extract from the Lewiston Teller, which is the leading newspaper in Northern Idaho, and is published at Lewiston, the principal city in that section. I read from the issue of March 7, 1886:

There is a class of restless spirits who are always active to do or say anything when they think they can distract counsels and defeat the will of the people, and do this stealthily and not be found out among the people where they reside and are well known. North Idaho is not without this class, and we presume that every community has a counterpart of this class; they are generally suspected, spotted, and found out in due time. The day is too far gone for men to long play false to a principle and not be known if they say anything that affects the public weal. The advocates of annexation have always been open and bold and courted manly discussion of the pros and cons of the question. Their candle has never been hid under a bushel, but has shone out so all that would look could see what they claimed as their principles and the reasons for their opinions. Their principles have been well discussed in the press of North Idaho and some in South Idaho, and even in Washington Territory. It was thoroughly discussed for days in the constitutional convention held in Walla Walla in 1878 by the delegates, and triumphed, although some of the ablest men in that convention fought the measure manfully, as those who heard the discussions will attest.

It is not now a new question among the people of either Idaho or Washington, nor a political scheme for partisan purposes, as charged by HILL in the House of Representatives when the bill was up on the 23d of February. We in the north of Idaho petitioned Congress for the measure as far back as 1865, after Congress had cut off Montana from Idaho, finding the narrow Panhandle of North Idaho too narrow to form proper and convenient county boundaries. We have in various ways, by petitions, memorials, and votes, continued our importunities ever since, and the passage of HAILEY'S bill, supported by VOORHEES, in the House of Representatives on the 24th of February was the first recognition of our rights and wishes by either branch of Congress more than to receive petitions and refer them to committees, and there they have slumbered because of opposition in Congress which have overpowered the friends and advocates of the measure.

I also submit an article from the same paper, in the issue of March 11, 1886, entitled "Misstatements of the News." It is a very full review of the history of the whole question of annexation of Northern Idaho to Washington Territory, and is a very complete, intelligent, and forcible statement of the matter. It is as follows:

A Washington dispatch of March 3 intimates that the people of North Idaho are everywhere desiring that the Senate should suspend action on the annexation question until Idaho can be heard from and such action will be taken in the Senate. That telegrams and letters are pouring in from the north desiring this delay. Of course, if such be the fact, who writes these letters, and what they contain, and what reasons are urged for this delay are not known to the people of the north except in a few instances, and the authors of these dispatches and letters are not made public here in Idaho, and so far as we know they are manufactured, if they exist at all, for a specific occasion by a few enemies of annexation who are not known here, and up to the present time have never dared to express publicly such views. It is very difficult on any question of general importance to the public to meet stealthy and irresponsible charges. We have been disposed to consider that if these charges have any authenticity that men would be sufficiently honorable to let their views be known by the people who are to be affected by their discussion or opposition to the principles advocated by those who are in favor of the bill to annex. And we did not suppose that a few irresponsible persons writing under cover would be listened to and would have weight with a body like the United States Senate, so as to delay or defeat a measure which has been so long before Congress with the vote of the almost unanimous people of all the counties of North Idaho. If there has been a change of sentiment this change has not been produced in any great number of the people of North Idaho generally.

There has been no expression either by public petition or votes of the people to indicate this, adverse to the last expression given when the people voted for HAILEY and Singiser, both of whom were pledged unqualifiedly to annexation, save the recent action taken by a few Montanians under the leadership of ex-Delegate Clagget, who had recently come over from Montana to locate mines in the north part of Shoshone County, and the remonstrance of two of the county commissioners of Idaho County, without any vote or action of the people of that county, which was gotten up by the publisher of the Nez Percé News, as he said, based upon some dissatisfaction which had been murmured in consequence of the dividing line not taking in all of Idaho County. We propose for the first time to notice some of the misstatements mentioned as a part of the history of this annexation question of North Idaho, as published in the News. He says the people have never expressed any intention or design to be annexed to Washington, except as a contingency that might be desirable in the event of the admission of Washington Territory as a State, but there are not a baker's dozen of voters in North Idaho who ever desired to be switched off from one Territory and added to another.

Annexation to Washington Territory has never been contemplated or desired and had it ever been presented to the people as an issue they would have promptly voted it down. How any man claiming to be a journalist and acquainted with the history of this question in Northern Idaho can have the face and brazen effrontery to make such assertions and publish them to the world to be read by hundreds in North Idaho who have acted and voted upon the question, we are unable to reconcile with his purpose to tell the truth. In 1873, long before the question of Statehood for Washington, a convention was called at Lewiston for the purpose of memorializing Congress for Northern Idaho to be annexed to Washington. Representatives from all the counties of North Idaho were in that convention, which was largely attended; and the late Judge John Clark was chosen chairman. A committee of nine persons were unanimously chosen by that body to draft a memorial to Congress to be presented asking for this annexation. Mr. HAILEY was then in Congress, and the question was presented and referred to the Committee on Territories. Mr. HAILEY being a resident of South Idaho was opposed to it, and went before the committee and interposed his objections. At the next election Hon. S. S. Fenn from North Idaho was the Democratic candidate for Delegate and Hon. Thomas Bennett of South Idaho was the Republican candidate and was opposed to annexation, while Fenn ran and was announced everywhere as an annexation man, and in the north received all the votes but about one hundred on that issue. He was elected throughout the Territory over Bennett, but the counting officers at Boisé City gave Bennett the certificate of election, which forced Fenn to contest the election before Congress, which contest continued for many months after the time that Fenn should have had his seat. The decision was finally given and Fenn was declared duly elected.

Meantime while this contest was going forward petitions were sent from every precinct in North Idaho, except three, containing about sixteen hundred names, more than four-fifths of the whole voting population of North Idaho at that time, asking for the annexation of these northern counties to Washington, which petitions were forwarded by Dr. M. A. Kelly, of this city, and placed in the hands of Delegate Jacobs, of Washington Territory, and presented to Congress by him, as Delegate Fenn, of Idaho, had not then obtained his seat. Those petitions were referred to a committee in Congress, from which committee they never emerged. This was in the spring of 1876. Dr. Kelly, of this city, and ex-Delegate Jacobs, of Washington Territory, are referred to, as also the sixteen hundred signers in North Idaho who signed the petitions, and we presume that the files of the Committee on Territories will contain these petitions if they are not destroyed. The first time the State for Washington was agitated in North Idaho, was after the Legislature of Washington in the winter of 1877-'78, passed the act authorizing the calling of a convention of delegates to frame a constitution for Washington, and providing that the northern counties of Idaho be permitted to choose a delegate who should have a seat in said convention, and be permitted to take part in the discussions, but without the right of a vote. The question was then agitated in North Idaho, shall the people elect such a delegate? It was adjudged that they do so and accept of the terms offered by Washington. Accordingly a delegate convention of the northern counties of Idaho was called to be held at Lewiston; that convention was fully represented by delegates from all the counties and they chose a delegate to the convention in Washington, to be held at Walla Walla in June, 1878.

That convention met, framed a constitution and schedule, which was afterward submitted to the people of both Washington and Northern Idaho, and voted upon receiving votes of the people of North Idaho. All but 34 were cast in North Idaho in favor of said constitution. Since that time the people have acquiesced in Statehood for Washington, with Northern Idaho included, with the expectation that Statehood would be the most expeditious way of securing annexation, but in no instance have the people of Northern Idaho relinquished their desire to be annexed to Washington whether or not it became immediately admitted into the Union. Hence the statement made by the News alluded to has not always been, as it says, the battle-cry of the north, annexation and Statehood; but, on the other hand, has been annexation with or without Statehood. It is strange that if there is such opposition as is claimed by the dispatch of March 3 that it is not formulated and expressed by parties of North Idaho, who are willing to let it be known by the people here, but not a writer in all the papers of Northern Idaho is willing to announce that opposition and have it published over his signature in these northern counties, save the few Montanians who desire to slough off the mining districts of Shoshone County to go to Montana, and the publisher of the Nez Percé News, and two of the county commissioners of Idaho County, and N. B. Willey, who has always been an open opponent of any and all annexation.

The members of Congress in the House who heard Hon. JOHN HAILEY'S statements of the facts in the history of this movement, as also the facts stated by Hon. C. S. VOORHEES, Delegate from Washington, have as near the truth in regard to the history and progress of this question as could be stated, and while Hon. Mr. HAILEY, being a resident of Southern Idaho, acknowledged himself personally objecting to the north going to Washington, but admits the fact that the people all want annexation and have so signified for years in different ways, and that both Democrats and Republicans of Northern and Southern Idaho have asked that this wish of the people be granted, therefore Mr. HAILEY himself demanded the passage of the bill. Surely the Senate can not now, with this history before them, demand that the people shall be at the expense of having a rehearing at the polls simply at the dictation of a few restless and grumbling spirits, who dare not make their objections known among the people who are to be affected by annexation. It is said that whisky dealers in some of the towns object to annexation to Washington because the late Legislature of that Territory has passed a local option law. We can hardly believe that they are willing to admit that, and much less to publish it over their own signatures as a reason. We have heard some say they do not fear local option or high license; that it will benefit them.

If it shall be objected that the detaching of Northern Idaho from the Territory will leave the Territory too small for a State, such objection is easily answered. After detaching the portion of Idaho proposed to be included within the boundaries of the new State, the area of which is estimated at 20,000 square miles, that Territory would still contain 66,294 square miles, larger in extent than Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Mississippi, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Wisconsin. And when Idaho is admitted into the Union as a State, if its area is thought too small a portion of the Territory of Montana, Arizona, or Utah, or of all of them, could be incorporated with the State boundaries, and would give the new State more convenient and natural boundaries than the present boundaries of the Territory.

The senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] yesterday said to me that he would like to know how Southern Idaho would be left after the northern part of the Territory should be incorporated within the boundaries of the new State; that is to say, whether it would possess the territory and the resources necessary to form a State. In answer to that question I will say that at the last census the population of Idaho Territory was only 32,000, but it is now estimated, and I think properly so, at 75,000. Estimating the population of Northern Idaho at 20,000 would leave Southern Idaho with a population at present of 55,000 inhabitants. In answer to an inquiry yesterday Mr. HAILEY, informed me that about 35 per cent. of Southern Idaho is capable of being cultivated, and that about one-third of the present population of the Territory is engaged in agricultural pursuits, about one-third in stock-raising, and about one-third in mining; and that according to his judgment Southern Idaho is capable of sustaining a population of from 500,000 to 1,000,000 inhabitants.

Mr. LOGAN. What would be the residue of Idaho?

Mr. DOLPH. Sixty-six thousand two hundred and ninety-four square miles.

Mr. LOGAN. After this is taken out of it?

Mr. DOLPH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Before the Senator passes from that point, I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. What kind of agriculture can be carried on there?

Mr. DOLPH. I am not familiar enough to state. I understood from Mr. HAILEY that it is the usual agricultural pursuits, wheat and other grains that are grown in temperate regions, and vegetables.

Mr. GEORGE. Is irrigation necessary to successful agriculture there?

Mr. DOLPH. In some portions of the Territory it is; in other portions it is not.

Mr. GEORGE. What are the facilities for irrigation there?

Mr. DOLPH. The same as in all the other regions west of the Rocky Mountains. Of course the best locations are first taken up, but there are facilities for irrigating sufficiently, desert land in connection with that which is susceptible of cultivation without irrigation, so that some 35 per cent. of the area of Southern Idaho is susceptible of cultivation, which is a larger per cent. than the average of territory west of the Rocky Mountains until you come near the coast.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the character of the soil?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Will my colleague allow me to make a statement?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask one more question. What is the character of the soil devoted to agriculture there, fertile or sterile?

Mr. DOLPH. My colleague has asked me to yield to him for a moment. Perhaps he can give some information in regard to it, and I am very glad to yield to him.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I was about to make a suggestion to my colleague, with the consent of the Senator from Mississippi, in regard to the facilities for irrigation in Idaho. It seems to me they are superior to almost any other section of the country in connection with the two rivers, the Boise and the Snake.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The soil itself, being watered, is good?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Magnificent. It produces wheat in abundance, magnificent crops of wheat, and clover and all kinds of grasses.

Mr. GEORGE. The senior Senator from Oregon, however, has not answered my question as to the character of the soil, whether it is sterile or fertile.

Mr. DOLPH. It is very fertile wherever it can be cultivated without irrigation, and wherever water can be got upon it; it is exceedingly rich. The Senator from Mississippi spoke to me yesterday just after the Senate had convened while I was engaged as he knows, and expected to speak, upon this bill. I have not had time to look up this matter as I should otherwise have done. However, before this discussion is ended I shall be very glad to throw all the light on this branch of the subject possible, if it is so desired by the Senate. The Senator from Connecticut suggests that the fact that some eighteen or twenty thousand persons are already engaged in agriculture in the Territory shows there must be good land there.

There is, in my judgment, another question demanding consideration in connection with this bill, and it has reference to the compact made between the States represented by the Congress and the people of the original Oregon Territory in the organic act of that Territory.

The question was forcibly stated in the printed suggestions of Hon. Thomas H. Brents, then Delegate in Congress from Washington Territory, to the Senate Committee on Territories, and made part of the report of that committee submitted to the Senate at the Forty-eighth Congress to accompany the bill for the admission of Washington Territory. I will not repeat what is there so well said, but will only say in brief that the proposition is that the provision made in the fifth article of compact contained in the ordinance of 1787 for the government of territory northwest of the Ohio River, for the division of the territory into States, and their admission into the Union, which was as follows, "Whenever any of said States have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such States shall be admitted into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government," was adopted and made part of the organic act of Oregon Territory, and thus became a compact between the States and the people of the Territory. In the act of Congress of May 26, 1790, providing a Territorial government for the territory south of the Ohio River, it was declared that the inhabitants of that territory should "enjoy all the privileges set forth in the ordinance of the late Congress for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio."

The debates in Congress upon the admission of Tennessee into the Union show that this clause was understood to be a compact with the people of that Territory; that a Territory of suitable dimensions, when it possessed 60,000 free inhabitants, should be admitted into the Union as a State. The organic act of Oregon Territory contained a similar clause guaranteeing to the people of that Territory the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the people of the Territory northwest of the Ohio by the ordinance of 1787. This was claimed by some of the ablest statesmen in Congress, in the debate upon the bill for the admission of Oregon, to be a compact with the people of the Territory that when the Territory possessed 60,000 free inhabitants it should be entitled to admission as a State. If this was true in the case of Oregon, it needs no argument to show that it is equally so in the case of Washington. I shall only state this question and leave it. It is not so important at this time as it would have been at an earlier day. Washington now has not only 60,000 free inhabitants but three times that number, a population large enough to entitle her to admission under any rule that has ever been invoked as to population.

Of course, if the Territory was entitled under that compact to admission when it had a population of 60,000, it presents all the stronger case with three times that number. Here is a solemn agreement of this great Government made with its own citizens. It included all who were within original Oregon at the date of the organization of the Territory, and all who should afterward become resident citizens of the Territory. It stipulated for the admission of States of suitable demensions to be carved out of the Territory when the population reached the number provided in the ordinance of 1787. Will we keep the stipulation? During the discussion of that bill in the House of Representatives, Hon. Alexander H. Stephens made a speech, from which I quote. He said:

I have this to say to the House, and especially to those who have any doubt about the population of Oregon, that, for myself, I hold that there can be no question but that there is sufficient population there to require us, under existing laws and compacts, to admit that Territory as a State into the Union. There must be at least sixty thousand people there, and my own opinion is that there are at least one hundred thousand.

In the bill organizing the Territory of Oregon, which was passed in 1848, I find the following clause:

"SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of said Territory shall be entitled to enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the people of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the articles of compact contained in the ordinance for the government of said Territory, on the 13th day of July, 1787: and shall be subject to all the conditions, and restrictions, and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of said Territory." (Statutes at Large, volume 9, page 329.)

This, sir, was a guarantee given in 1848, after the settlement of the controversy with England as to that Territory. Now I call the attention of the House to the ninth article of the ordinance of 1787:

"And whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its Delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: Provided, The constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and, so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the Confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000."

If there were any question as to whether there were 90,000 people there; if there were any question as to whether Oregon comes up to the ratio of representation; yet, sir, I hold that there is a solemn guarantee and a compact made with those people which we ought not to disregard.

If this view of the organic law of the Territory is correct, as I think it is, these people who, in the face of great obstacles, hardships, and privations, have laid the foundations of a rich and powerful commonwealth, do not come here as suppliants for favors at the hands of Congress. On the contrary, they demand that which of right is theirs, and to further deprive them of which will be a gross violation of a solemn compact—a compact under the provisions of which it has been held, and by some of the ablest and greatest men this country has produced, and whose counsel even now is worthy the consideration of those who seek to control and direct the destinies of the nation—it was held, I say, that a Territory to the people of which the guarantees of this compact had been extended became entitled to admission as a State ipso facto the moment its population amounted to 60,000.

The people of Washington Territory (as was so eloquently and truthfully said when the admission of Oregon was under discussion in the House of Representatives, concerning the people of that Territory), "come like the wise men of the East, not asking gifts, but bringing gifts. What do they bring? Why, sir, the trophies of their own labor, the evidences of their own worth. They present before us the cities and towns which they have founded. They present schools, churches, and workshops. They bring all, all the products of their labor, and place them upon the altar of the Union, a pledge for the common welfare and the common defense."

Such a people can safely be intrusted with self-government. The junior Senator from Iowa, during the debate upon the bill for the admission of Dakota, in an eloquent and forcible manner portrayed the energy and enterprise of the pioneers who, amidst dangers and hardships, penetrated the wilderness carrying civilization with them, and with loyalty to the General Government and respect for law and order laid the foundations of great and prosperous States. The encomiums of the Senator upon the pioneers of his State and other States was deserved by them and worthy of him, and as I listened to his well-chosen words and recalled the early history of my own State I fully sympathized with the sentiments he expressed and shared in the evident pride with which he alluded to the unexampled growth of the Northwest.

All that was said by the Senator concerning the early settlers of Iowa can be applied with even greater force to the pioneers who, when from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean was an unbroken wilderness, crossed the continent, and in defiance of savage foes and in the face of the claim of Great Britain planted civilization in what afterward became the Territory of Oregon, and included what is now Oregon, Washington, and Idaho. Although for years their petitions to Congress for protection and for a Territorial government were unheeded and they were turned away with the suggestion that the country was not worth saving, their love for the Stars and Stripes never abated, their loyalty to the United States never wavered. With heroic self-sacrifice they organized for defense against the hostile Indians and to hold the country for the United States; organized a provisional government, with legislative, judicial, and executive powers; established law and order, so that when, by the tardy action of Congress a Territorial government was established for Oregon Territory, the officers of the Territory found an organized community, governed by laws self-imposed, by which order was maintained and individual rights protected.

That grand man, Doctor Whitman, who left his family exposed to the perils of a far-off, isolated region and with a heroic fortitude and patriotic devotion unsurpassed in history, crossed the continent in mid-winter to give his testimony to the administration as to the value and resources of that region and prevent, as he supposed, the ignominious surrender of the United States to the claim of Great Britain and to incite emigration to that country to hold it for the United States, and who afterward lost his life, as believed by many, on account of his loyalty to American interests, is but a conspicuous example of the heroism and patriotism which animated that whole band of pioneers. And, whatever the true basis of our legal claim to that region may have been, we are indebted more to the pioneers who settled, occupied, and held it as the property of the United States for, the settlement of the controversy in our favor, than to all our claims of purchase and discovery combined.

I have read with great interest the report of the junior Senator [Mr. BUTLER] from South Carolina, made at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, to accompany the bill to provide a Territorial government for Alaska. After citing the provisions of the treaty of the cession of Alaska Territory, of March 30, 1867, to show that by the treaty "the inhabitants of the ceded Territory, with the exception of the uncivilized native tribes, were to be admitted to all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States," and "to be maintained and protected in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion," the report continues:

> These are solemn stipulations and guarantees of this Government made in the treaty of cession, and yet for fifteen years that we have had possession of this Territory the six thousand or seven thousand Russian subjects, transferred by the treaty, who have chosen to become American citizens, to say nothing of our own citizens, have been almost wholly without "maintenance" or "protection" in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, or religion.
> There was at one time a quasi-military government established in the Territory by quartering a few companies of regulars at several points on the coast, but this was inadequate and unsatisfactory and of brief duration. With this exception the Territory and its inhabitants have been practically at the mercy of outlaws, and have had such protection only as their sense of self-preservation afforded. This, we say, is not creditable to the American people, nor a faithful observance of treaty stipulations. It will not do, in reply to this proposition, to say that the number of inhabitants is too small, or the Territory too remote or unprofitable or unproductive to justify the expense and trouble of giving them the protection of law.
> We must assume that the treaty guaranteeing protection was made with a full knowledge of all the facts in this regard, and having made the guarantee and the Russian Government having fulfilled its part of the treaty in good faith every consideration of national honor behooves us to carry out ours in good faith, if but ten American citizens are to be beneficiaries. It is not a safe rule to measure the performance of national guarantees in affording protection of law to citizenship, by the number of people to be thus protected, but rather by the right of every single citizen, however remote or insignificant he may be, to that protection.

If the six or seven thousand Russian subjects who chose to remain in Alaska and become American citizens, and the few other American citizens had a stronger guarantee of a Territorial government for Alaska than the people of Washington Territory have for the admission of the Territory into the Union, I confess I am not able to appreciate the distinction between the two cases. The Territory having presented this claim for admission, and having complied, upon its part, with the terms of the compact, adopting the language of the Senator from South Carolina, every consideration of honor—"national honor"—"behooves" us to fulfill the compact upon our part.

The proposed State is shown to possess sufficient territory to constitute a State; a population greater than the ratio required by the present apportionment for a Representative in Congress; the financial ability necessary to support a State government; institutions not repugnant to the Federal Constitution or laws of the United States and in harmony with a republican form of government. The people of the Territory are practically unanimous in favor of admission, and the natural resources of the proposed State, its geographical situation, its commercial advantages, promise, if it shall be admitted as a State, to make it in the near future one of the most wealthy, powerful, and prosperous States in the Union. The eyes of one hundred and eighty-five thousand people residing within the territorial limits of the proposed State are turned with great expectation toward this Congress. They are waiting to see whether it will keep faith with them and redeem the promise made to them in the organization of Oregon Territory; whether it will recognize the marked development of the Territory within the last few years and the new relations of that region to the States of the Union, and grant to them the coveted boon, enjoyed by the citizens of the States, of participating in the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States, of electing members of Congress, being represented in the United States Senate, choosing their own officers, and making their own laws. Having served a probation of more than a quarter of a century as a Territory they have grown restless under the restraints of minority, and greatly desire emancipation. The people of all parties, with practical unanimity, demand at our hands like treatment to that heretofore accorded to the people of all the Territories under similar circumstances.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, after the examination I have been able to give to this measure I find but a single objection to it, which I hope can be remedied. But whether it is or not, it will not divert me from my purpose to support this bill. It is found in the seventh section of the bill. It relates to the power of the President of the United States to bring this new State into the Union by a proclamation. The practice originated, I believe, with the State of Nevada or Colorado. I think those are the only States in which this modern practice has been adopted of passing an enabling act with a provision in it that after certain conditions had been complied with and that the constitution which should be presented by the constitutional convention of the State should be republican in form, thereupon the President should issue his proclamation bringing it into the Union as a State.

I regard that as a very unsafe practice and of doubtful constitutionality, because after all there must be a final act of admission, and if the final act of admission is a President's proclamation, I do not quite see how that comports with the requirement of the Constitution that Congress may admit new States into the Union. I doubt very much whether Congress can delegate any of its power to the President of the United States so as to enable him by a proclamation to bring the State into the Union. I see no reason why Congress might not as well delegate such power to the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States as to the President, for unquestionably whatever power he exercises over the destiny of the State to bring it in or to keep it out of the Union by issuing a proclamation or refusing to issue it, it is a power that has been delegated to him merely by an act of Congress.

The practice, however, has been established in the admission of two States into the Union, and perhaps there could be no danger of our pursuing it unless it might be in the case of a Territory situated like Utah. I am quite sure that Congress would not delegate to the President the power to admit Utah as a State into the Union as a State by a mere proclamation without any examination of the constitution which those people might adopt.

The true doctrine is this, that after the people within the limits of the Territory have in a legal form expressed their wish in regard to their organic law, it shall be submitted to Congress for its examination, for its consideration, and for its approval. I remember that in regard to the State of Alabama, when the constitution of that State was submitted to Congress, it was stated in the act of admission that the constitution was approved by Congress. It is not so in all of the States. We have varied our practice in that regard. But the approval is not a necessary thing to be expressed in the act of admission. Of course we will not admit a State into the Union if Congress should not approve of its constitution.

Having stated my objection in this brief form, I submit to the Committee on Territories whether in this case it would not be better to observe that method of admission which prescribes that the constitution shall first be adopted and submitted to Congress, and that the State shall be admitted by Congress after an examination of the organic law of the State.

I accept all the statements which have been made by the Senators who have addressed the Senate upon the admission of this Territory into the Union as to its resources, its power, and the excellence of its climate. Indeed, although the pictures which the Senators have drawn of Washington Territory might be considered a little extravagant by persons who have not taken the pains to look into this subject, after all their pictures are simply meager descriptions of a very great and beautiful country, and yet their statements are eloquent and very forcible.

There is no part of the American Union, considered geographically, which has greater prospective advantages than Washington Territory. It has been one of the misfortunes of this generation of men, and will be a misfortune that will hang to the destiny of this country, I fear, for many years to come, that we did not insist upon 54.40 instead of 49°. We should then have included the great bay that I call Vancouver Bay, made up of a series of straits, inlets, sounds, and interior waters, all of which aggregated together will measure from north to south something like 400 miles of interior waters, with an average depth almost up to the shores on either side of 40 fathoms—the most remarkable inlet from any ocean in the world, the easiest to protect with fortifications or with fleets, and the most dangerous to be in the hands of a rival power—a great maritime power.

It is a great pity, perhaps, for the world that one nation or the other, either Great Britain or the United States, should not have owned entirely this grand inlet of waters. As it is, we have divided it by running a line through the Straits of Fuca, bending around Vancouver Island, running north until we strike 49° of latitude, and then east along that line for our northern border.

The country adjacent to this remarkable inlet of waters, which runs 150 miles in Washington Territory, is clothed with forests the magnificence of which is not approximated elsewhere in the world except in the Sierra Nevada Mountains. The value of those forests to commerce, to the people of the United States, if they can be converted into lumber to be shipped abroad, to the worn-out countries of Asia and Europe, will be something incalculable. Generation after generation of the American people will be realizing the value of those forests when our names, who now discuss the admission of this State into the Union, will have been forgotten. They are practically inexhaustible. The timber that is found in them is of a most excellent and beautiful description. There are now in Washington Territory no less than thirty or forty very large lumbering establishments that do their trading with Australia, China, Japan, and along the coast of South America; and their investments run all the way from a half million dollars up to four and five million dollars capital. They employ many sailing ships, slow-going vessels, and build a good many of them.

That traffic is being conducted in a way to give the highest color of hope to the future of the Pacific trade, about which I feel far more interest than I do in regard to the trade of any other part of the United States except the Gulf of Mexico, and to which I attach far greater importance than I do to-day to the Atlantic trade. For when the United States have filled up with 300,000,000 of population, as likely enough will be done within the coming hundred years, the people who occupy the interior of this country will derive $10 of their wealth from the Pacific Ocean to where the people now occupying the interior of this country derive $1 of wealth from the Atlantic Ocean.

Considered in a political view, there could be nothing more important to the welfare of the people of the whole Union than to have a State established at that angle of our Northwestern possessions one side of which is washed by the Pacific Ocean and the other by the Straits of Fuca. I may describe it as a political buttress standing out there partly in the sea, opposed directly to the power and enterprise of the greatest rival that we have in the world—people of our own kith and kindred, whose power and enterprise we certainly ought to learn to estimate, if we have not done it yet—the British people.

What are they doing there? There is the great Fraser River that comes into one of these straits or sounds—I forget the name of the principal sound which it empties into, but it is in this great body of of interior water near Vancouver Island. That river has fine navigation for more than 250 miles from the coast, up which steamers of a very large class are running continually; and down along that river to its mouth comes the Canadian Pacific Railroad, which is now completed. We are toiling along through the Cascade Mountains with 60 or 70 miles of very heavy work to do before we can get our Northern Pacific road through on a direct line, while the Canadian Pacific, connecting on its east with the waters of Lake Superior and on its west, as ours will, with the waters of Vancouver Bay or Puget Sound, is entirely completed.

You may rely upon it that that is one of the best railroads in the world, constructed without reference to the outlay of money, laid down firmly, clothed with a most excellent quality of steel rails, and equipped as scarcely any other railroad in the Western world is equipped. I have it from friends who have gone over it and made personal inspection, railroad men, and men also who have worked out large sections of contracts upon that railway, that it is one of the best establishments in the world.

I remember within the last year to have seen a statement, extracted, I think, from the London Times, giving an expression of the British Crown through its premier in regard to this railroad, in which it was said that the British Crown would volunteer the payment of £20,000,000 for the completion of that road rather than it should fail.

Why does Great Britain want that road? It is far north, about 300 miles, I believe, on an average, north of the Northern Pacific road of ours. Why do they want it? The first idea in the mind of a British statesman always is power. A British statesman feels himself adequate to the accomplishment of anything which lies within the reach of enlightened intellect, force of character, courage, and determination. They have a wise, sagacious government, that has forecast, and prudence, and thought. They ponder upon questions that lie fifty or a hundred years ahead, and gradually, sedately, and inevitably they work their way to the accomplishment of that great end. They do not falter about it; they do not hesitate; they turn neither to the right nor to the left; and while they do not boast about it, they seldom fail to accomplish their purposes.

Great Britain has possessions in Australia, which are simply another continent, equal almost in material strength and wealth to the continent of South America, lying in a temperate latitude, fruitful in all that the earth produces, abundant in mines, surrounded by the seas, lying on the highway between India and the Atlantic, a place where her population gathers and strengthens and pays revenue, not by direct tribute, but through commerce, to London and the other great cities of England; a place where the heart of Great Britain pulsates almost as freely and as strongly as it does in England itself. She wants to be connected by two lines with that country. The longer line is through the Suez Canal, and in some respects that is the more difficult and the more dangerous line.

She has been paying heavy tribute to us for the passage of her mails and much of her light merchandise over our railways ever since the completion of our transcontinental system. She determined to get rid of that exaction which we were making upon her, and which she was compelled to submit to for the purpose of saving time in the transmission of her valuable merchandise, her exchange, and her mails. Hence it was that the Crown of Great Britain was willing to pay a bonus of £20,000,000 for the purpose of completing in first-class order and maintaining the Canadian Pacific Railway rather than to have it fail of completion, or even to be seriously delayed.

When Great Britain had that trouble with us about our possessions on the northwestern coast, was it a mere ideal fancy of hers that she desired to be possessed of a portion of the waters of that great inlet of the sea, and Vancouver Island, and the coasts along that island? It was one of the grandest of all the projects of British enterprise. She saw the time when railroads would reach across this continent, when she would have there an opportunity for the commercial control of the traffic of the great Pacific Ocean. She wanted a home port on the Pacific. She got it, and having got it she has gone on to improve it. She has got her railway running to it; she has got two vast colonies lying above it, British Columbia and the Northwestern territory, which, though not as yet very populously inhabited, are attracting population rapidly and containing a vast area of fertile lands.

Great Britain has commenced to build her cities on that coast. There is Victoria, at the southern extremity of Vancouver Island; and what has she got at Victoria? She has a naval station there, a navy-yard, and a larger dock than there is in the United States except one, and that is at Mare Island. There is not a dock on the Atlantic coast which compares with that at Vancouver Island. Who has she got there? Admiral Seymour in command. What is he doing there? He has one of those magnificent iron-clad ships there that shelled Alexandria. Why? To give dignity to his enterprise and stateliness to the progress of British power in the Northwest, and perhaps to remind us that after all we had better not take many liberties with a country which is able to float around the world a ship like that, and with an admiral in command who takes charge of that place as a post of honor for the purpose of establishing the flag of Great Britain in power, in strength, and in perpetuity upon that shore.

What is our nearest town to that? What is our nearest fortification?

As to fortifications, I do not believe we have any; not a shovel of earth, so far as I remember, has been thrown up on Puget Sound, not a gun mounted. Port Townsend, lying 100 miles nearly to the southeast of Victoria, away down in the bosom of Washington Territory, at a narrow neck on this very deep inlet, is a place of commerce just commencing to bud and to grow.

We pass on down from that and come to Tacoma, just on the eastern shore of this inlet, a town which has magnificent prospects as being the terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad when that shall be completed. Then we have Seattle and Olympia—towns which are growing up there, dependent entirely for their support, for their permanence, and for their future growth upon the enterprise of men who have gone out under a Territorial government and who are trying to establish themselves with capital and to surround themselves with every form of civilization that is necessary for an American community.

There is no very great certainty about anything in Washington Territory as long as it remains in its present condition. The Government of the United States is going to pay no attention to building a dock-yard there, or to building defenses upon the coast, or to utilizing those vast forests of timber in any respect, building ships or otherwise, as long as it remains a Territory. It might remain a Territory there for fifty years, and being only under the control of Congress, that can ill afford to give its attention to the proper regulation of the affairs of any Territorial government, it will have no settled prosperity, it will make no march in the progress of wealth and influence; certainly it will not build up into that condition of political influence which the Government of the United States now so much needs for the purpose of focalizing and strengthening its power in that quarter of our possessions.

Sir, if there is a place on the American continent where all of the very best powers we have got under our form of government ought to be concentrated it is in Washington Territory. It is an indispensable thing for the national security, to say nothing of the progress that her people ought to make and must make in that quarter.

I should very deeply regret if any question of population or any other question of a physical character should intervene between us and our duty of organizing those people into a State and admitting them at once, or as soon as may be, in consideration of the proper order of the admission of a State into the Union. I should regret it deeply.

Our country is very widely divided territorially. The intermediate belt of it which lies between the crest of the Rocky Mountains, I may say, and the crest of the Sierra Nevada Mountains is comparatively yet a wilderness, and is likely to remain so until the art of man has developed some method of irrigation by which agriculture can be promoted in that region. It has every resource of fertility except water. The rains of heaven are obstructed out of that great basin of the Humboldt River and other rivers of like character, so that plains which are as fertile as any that are to be found in the delta of the Mississippi are barren of anything, except sage-brush, merely for the want of irrigation.

That is likely to remain a dry and comparatively desert region for many long years to come, and certainly does not afford a very inviting field for immigration. But when you pass beyond to California, to Oregon, and to Washington Territory, you have, particularly in the latter Territory, the most attractive field for immigration which the United States has left or has ever yet presented. The agricultural lands of Washington Territory are remarkable for their fertility. As much might even be said of the southern parts of the Territory of Alaska. Certainly as much can be said for the intermediate territory lying between the southern boundary of Alaska and Washington Territory. That is a singularly fertile coast.

It has another advantage which men are disposed to look at with some doubt and sometimes with derision, and those who speak of it we regard as taking a poetical license with the subject. There is one great climatic fact there which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has been able to prove to me by his own experience as existing as far back into the interior as the Territory of Idaho, and that is the steady and soft chinook winds. Now, what is that? It is a cause like that which has made Ireland the emerald of the sea, only it is a better wind than ever blew across Ireland—a fresher and a softer wind, and one that brings more benefactions to mankind, more greenness to the country, more of the vigor of life to the population and to all animal creation.

My friend the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], who spent a portion of last fall out in Idaho with his son who resides there, told me that he had witnessed the effect of the Chinook winds as far back as he was from the coast, and described their effect upon that portion of the country. As long as those winds continue, and they continue for a great period in the fall and winter, the temperature is warm, cattle and horses thrive, grass grows, flowers bloom, not precisely as they would in the spring, but still all life is full of vigor and growth during the prevalence of those winds.

Now, whence do they come? They come from the southeast. Where they originate no man knows, I suppose, but they come across the Hawaiian Islands, they come up the South American coast, they cross the great current of warm water that comes in from Japan through the Aleutian Islands, and which makes Alaska a habitable country. They blow upon that coast and warm up the whole country until it is the rarest thing to see snow 2 inches deep in the valleys of the Territory of Washington. When the Cascade Mountains are covered with 4 or 5 feet of snow the Chinook winds will come and melt it down until they will be naked in four days. That is one of the attributes of the climate of Washington Territory which need not be omitted out of the account at all, because after all it is one of the most attractive features of that country.

Mr. President, I think it is a duty that we owe to the people of the United States to furnish them such advantages as we can in making settlements in that country. I want to see them go there rapidly. I want to see capital accumulating rapidly in Washington Territory. The country needs it. The United States needs it. We need a concentration of power upon that Northwestern coast, and if we do not have it and put American genius and enterprise to work there we can understand that very soon British enterprise and British genius and persistence will have stripped from us the rewards that belong naturally to the people who occupy this great country of ours in respect to the commerce of foreign countries along and across the Pacific Ocean.

We are in no condition to be idle about this or about any other matter that concerns the Pacific coast. We ought to be up and doing. We ought to have a policy in regard to that part of the country and in regard to other countries, and we ought to be pursuing it, for I believe that the Almighty will hold this nation of men strictly accountable for the abuse of their privileges, if after having endowed us as He has with all the strength of mind and body and cultivation that we possess we shall content ourselves with a lackadaisical life, without our doing that which He has given us an opportunity to do. He will not permit us to while away our time and waste our opportunities and smother our talents and bridle our energies and restrain our genius, and thereby cast a reproach upon the name of the American people and upon His good providence.

We find that the lands on this side of the belt, which I described a while ago, between the Rockies and the Sierra Nevada Mountains, are pretty well taken up. There is some little difficulty in getting valuable homesteads now anywhere west of the Mississippi River and east of the mountains. It is not a question of enterprise, or a question of contending with savages any more. That is not the question with us now. A railroad either runs to or not far away from every area of land where a habitable homestead is to be found, and it is only the travel of two or three days at the outside that a man has to make, in peace, quiet, and comfort, to get him a homestead, if one can be found on the public domain. What is the result? Nearly all the homesteads are taken up. No wonder they are nearly all occupied, and the tide of emigration that hitherto drained our population out to the West so rapidly is having its reflux. It is coming back, and it is surrounding the Territory of Oklahoma almost three deep with inquisitive and hungry men to break in upon that little reservation which we have there for Indians, and wherever we have a military reservation or any other little patch of ground that promises a good location for a homesteader we find that the people are swarming around it and demanding of Congress that it shall be opened to settlement.

Mr. President, we must provide against this. Our cities are being overloaded with population. New York city now has a growth that is almost beyond her control. The municipal powers of the large cities of this country are scarcely adequate to the preservation of life and property from the overgrowth of population, much of it unemployed. I am for draining it off, opening up outlets to it, and if I had no other reason for voting for this bill I would have that as a sufficient reason, that we could show our people that the United States had concentrated their attention upon the establishment of a great State in Washington Territory. The very moment that this bill passes and a State is ordained to be established in that Territory you will find the tide of emigration pouring into that region. It will give us great relief even at the present and more in the future; for when our men have settled themselves and have capitalized their property on that great Pacific coast they will look out to the West as our brethren in the Northeast have looked to the East across the Atlantic for new commercial enterprises, new sources of wealth.

Mr. President, I am not in favor of the policy, no matter who profits by it, no matter if some men get rich by it who ought not to get rich by it—I am not in favor of the policy of cutting down the enterprise which is carrying our people to that Western coast and which is opening highways of access to that country. I do not want to see that tunnel and that heavy line of road-bed remaining to be built through the Cascade Mountains delayed for ten years. In ten years' time the Canadian Pacific Railway will have established itself and its lines of traffic throughout the countries of the Pacific, and we shall find that it will snatch from the Bay of San Francisco half, or it may be more than half, of its trade. We must have a competitor there; we must have somebody there at least to divide with Great Britain the honors and the wealth also to be accumulated from her commercial adventures in that ocean.

The honorable Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] has done me the kindness to suggest that he has seen an advertisement of a line of fortnightly steamers from Victoria to Hong-Kong. She is now establishing a fortnightly line of steamers under the patronage of the British Government from Victoria to Hong-Kong.

Mr. FRYE. He ought to have told the Senator that they do not pay that line 2 cents a letter for carrying British mails, and that there is no postmaster-general there to veto an appropriation which would pay them 10.

Mr. MORGAN. That is very true, and I am sorry that we can not agree about everything; but we are agreeing now very well, I think, about Washington Territory. But the British people will have to bring their trade from the far interior, or perhaps across from Great Britain, that they supply to these fortnightly steamers; while we, if we go forward with proper energy, will have our steamers and our sailing ships also going out from our ports loaded with products of our own country, raised upon the Pacific shore. That is the advantage we shall have, and perhaps we can save the subsidy to the Government and yet make as much profit as British people can make who subsidize their lines.

But however that policy may work out, there can be no doubt at all that it is the duty of American statesmanship that we should make every provision to enable our people to go there, and feel safe and confident in going there, with their capital to develop this commerce and this prosperity. Of course capital is going nowhere unless it has security. A man wants to invest in Washington Territory. I care not what may be the line of investment, whether it is in a fishery, in lumbering, in mining, in agriculture, ship-building, merchandise, banking, or what not. He has capital that he has accumulated in the old States, and he wants to take it out there for a profitable investment. He says to himself, "This is a mere Territory; it has very little power; it has really no organized community. Even social institutions are affected by the loose condition of the government. Its agents, its judges, its people are appointed from abroad. We do not know whether the men that the President of the United States and the Senate will send there will be men who go to speculate upon the people or whether they will be in honest sympathy with the people, for they have no responsibility whatever to them. Therefore we shall delay our investments in Washington Territory until the Government of the United States establishes a State there, and after that State is established there we can then go and see what is the complexion of the community, what sort of people are going to manage this State, and, with all the great powers of Statehood belonging to them, we can understand that if they are a wise and good people they will soon necessarily become a greatly prosperous people." There is the whole argument, to my mind, so far as that is concerned.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say a few more words about our traffic in the Pacific Ocean. I think there are not enough of the Senators in this body who concern themselves about this matter, if they will allow me to say so. They either underestimate it or they have so much else to think about and to do that they do not consider this great question. But do we not see all the enlightened nations of the earth moving up in competition through the Pacific Ocean and taking this island and that and the other, commencing with the Phillipine Islands, having a strife about them, then coming on by the Caroline Islands even until they get to Samoa, where our former honorable Secretary of State, who now occupies a seat in the Senate, put himself to great trouble to negotiate a most excellent treaty for the United States. Under that treaty we should have the advantages of a port of our own there if we will provide the means for coaling our ships and whatever else might be necessary for their replenishing while they were out upon the cruises that carry them from fifteen to thirty days from shore.

We find the world frequently agitated by disputes between Spain and Germany, and even between Great Britain and Germany, in respect of the occupation of inconsiderable islands in the Pacific Ocean, islands that, when we were boys, we read about as places that were the habitations of cannibals. Now these little islands are matters of great consideration with the most eminent of foreign powers. Why is all this? It is because these nations are measuring their strength one with another, not merely for the purpose of having their flag to float upon conquered territory or newly acquired territory, but for the benefit of commerce, for its protection, and for its advancement. Commerce it is that rules this world at this hour. Armies and navies are mere servants of commerce to-day. The commercial men of the world to-day have the control of it. You can not mention now a man, whether he is a king or a subject, who has got sufficient military renown in this world to make him a dangerous element in politics—not one. No nation fears any king because of his belligerent power, but we look to the commercial power of nations; we look to the merchants, to the diplomatists, to the statesmen of the different nations to see whether or not we shall be able in the future to measure our progress with them. Those are the considerations that now influence mankind.

With a forethought that was worthy of one of the greatest statesmen this country has produced we obtained Alaska, and yet there was then an outburst of mingled indignation and scorn through many sections of the United States that we should have given $7,000,000, I believe it was, for the purchase of Alaska. There are the fisheries of the Pacific Ocean, boundless, exhaustless. There is the power of supplying food from the sea on that coast and the adjacent islands, which, if we had possessed the like power in Labrador and in Newfoundland on this coast we should have been a very much richer people to-day than we are and very far more powerful.

Then we commence at Vancouver Bay, the Straits of Fuca, with Washington Territory, and we run down to Mexico—a vast coast with four good inlets upon it, Puget Sound, Columbia River, the bay of San Francisco, and the bay of San Diego.

Beyond that we have fraternal relations, I may call them very friendly relations, with Hawaii, that outpost of the sea which stands centrally between us and China, Japan, and Australia. If we were deprived of our friendly relations with that group of small islands we should be bereft of very much that in the future will be of great benefit to the people of the United States.

But Great Britain has established herself throughout the world. Commencing at the mouth of the Red Sea, she comes on around the Indian coast to Hong-Kong and along the coast of South America. She has got her naval establishments, her naval stations, where she can send her ships and supply them with coal and provisions from place to place. She can go to San Francisco with a full supply of coal, and all the men that are necessary to man a ship and with every equipment necessary, quite as easily as she could go from Liverpool or any place on the English coast to St. Petersburg. She is prepared all over the ocean with depots, places of supply, where she is never wanting in the power to do all that she desires to do, or all that she can possibly do, with her army and her navy against any power of the world. I do not know that we shall ever get to that state of exaltation, I will call it, in respect of the powers of this great Government and its control among the nations of the earth.

I wish we could make the same boast that Great Britain can make. I should have no fear of the liberties of this people, not the slightest, if we had all the power on the sea in foreign countries that Great Britain has got. I would feel far more comfortable than I do in respect to our ability to discharge our obligation to our own citizens when they are abroad. We have a splendid coast, with many deep inlets and bays without fortifications, and perhaps they will remain so for a great while. Perhaps the world will be willing to let us alone until we choose to interfere with them in some way. I do not know. It may be, however, that the jealousy of our increasing riches may inspire them some of these days to interrupt our peace and to kill our commerce. Then they will have nothing to do but shake their fists at us and it will depart from the seas. They may do it, and will do it, if we make no provision for its security.

We have a line of picket-posts, commencing at Labrador, Newfoundland, to the Bermudas and all the West Indies, clear around our coast, and in the Pacific Ocean, all in the possession of foreign powers. The British Government gets as near to us as it can with its picket-posts; and when they go to Vancouver Island and to Victoria, where they know they have the control of the Straits of Fuca unless we do something to prevent them from having control, the first thing they do is to build a great dock-yard, a naval establishment, and after that a town. They build their railway to it, then their dock-yards, then their great naval establishment, and after they have done that they are ready to go to work and build a town. That is British policy as contrasted with American policy; and yet I am very sorry to say that we are quite lacking in proper enterprise in getting to that Western coast and taking care of it.

We have very easy facilities to avail ourselves of in uniting our Eastern and Western coasts. We have to do nothing more than to extend a friendly, cordial invitation to private men with capital to have a way through Lake Nicaragua where we can pass our fleet, it makes no difference what the size of the ships may be, from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. We could thus save ourselves the necessity of having two fleets, one to defend the Pacific and the other to defend the Atlantic. But not only does that excite no enthusiasm or interest among the American people, but it even seems to excite the distrust of the administration. They are opposed to it.

For my part, I am not capable of highly appreciating an idea of government which is content merely to pull through four years of administration without doing anything whatever for the progress of the American people. Perhaps a man ought to thank God hourly that he is permitted to live, and if he is to live four years in peace perhaps he ought to count them as the brightest and best part of his whole existence. Still, we should not stagnate because the lines have fallen to us in pleasant places. I would prefer to live like a man that had a purpose in life, and I would prefer that this nation should live like a great and powerful people who are working out a higher destiny, and I would prefer that the generations to follow us should be able to point back to our example and say, "These men understood something about what was the destiny of this country; they felt its necessities and its demands upon them, and they had the courage to march up to them."

Perhaps, Mr. President, this is not an opportune occasion for references of this kind; still it is germane to the point that we should have a clear and easy intercourse with our Western possessions. So far as our naval power is concerned, our Western coasts and harbors are utterly exposed, and that entirely without excuse.

When I was in San Francisco about two years ago, as a member of a committee of this body, I had occasion, as it was my duty, to look into some of the material resources of California in reach of that magnificent bay of San Francisco. I found there what was a surprise to me, and I do not believe the fact is yet credited by the iron and steel producers of this country—I found there the most magnificent and inexhaustible deposits of ores of the proper quality for making steel of high grade that are to be found anywhere in the world, ores absolutely without a trace of phosphorus or sulphur, with 65 to 70 per cent. of metallic iron, very low in silica, in the best condition that ores ever came from the hands of the Creator for the purpose of enticing men to make the best quality of steel. I found that steel was being made there. I found within 3 miles of San Francisco, upon the bay, not the largest, but the best equipped, the best furnished, the best arranged iron and steel foundry in the United States without a single exception so far as I have seen, worked entirely, even to the lifting of the doors, by hydraulic power, so that a man touched a little knob while sitting at his desk, and the doors of the great establishment lifted themselves to let the men in to go to work.

There are these ores in vast abundance and easily accessible to the shore. The fluxes are there. They dig the most beautiful marble out of the bosom of that soil that fluxes the iron they make into steel. There is every quality of fire-clay; and indeed every facility for the manufacture of iron. The only thing wanting in California is coal. They have excellent lignite there, but that will not run a furnace. In Oregon and Washington Territory they have excellent coal.

I was informed by the gentlemen who were engaged in making iron in California that they would have no occasion to go to Cardiff or Australia, abroad, or to Cumberland, in Maryland, for their coal; that the coal and coke that had been sent down from Seattle was of excellent quality; that they felt that they were entirely able to manufacture any quantity of iron and steel that might be wanted for the purposes of commerce or for the purposes of ship-building or gun-making.

There is congregated upon that coast every possible facility for the making of steel in any quantity that any government or any number of governments could demand; and yet it is used only to the extent of the work that is done in one establishment in San Francisco. It is fortunate for us that this establishment, founded upon private enterprise, has gone sufficiently far to the front in the practical manufacture of steel to convince Congress, which is slow to believe almost anything in that direction, that the power resides in California, in Oregon, and in Washington Territory to build and equip our Navy and supply it with guns equal to any that exist or can be produced.

Now, sir, without these facilities that country would not be worth so much as it is in my estimation, but with them we have the power of commanding the Pacific Ocean. They present the fact to the people of Great Britain that in order to cope with us in Vancouver Bay either in commerce or in war they have got to bring their ships across the sea. They can not build them here. We can build better ships in San Francisco Bay than they can build on the Clyde, and we will not go out of California for a particle of the material, except that we must go to our neighboring State of Oregon and Washington Territory for the coal, and in that respect we have the advantage of Great Britain. Now, sir, it remains with us to say whether we shall sleep on this power to supply this necessity, or whether we shall utilize it; whether this Government will take care of the Pacific States with the same zeal that we bestow on the Atlantic States. If we do this now, our commercial supremacy will be won and established in the Pacific Ocean. If we delay our work, the opportunity will soon be lost.

I could not content myself while the duty we owe to the country is under discussion without at least giving an expression of my views and convictions, and they are earnest and strong, that this generation of men and the legislators who are here to represent them owe to this country an unavoidable duty, than which no American statesman ever had a greater or a sublimer one, of opening to our people free access to the commerce of the Pacific Ocean and all the security we can give them in the gathering and enjoyment of its fruits.

As a part of this movement in order to build up our power on the Pacific coast, I, sir, coming from the Gulf of Mexico, extend the cordial greetings of the people of the South to the people on the North Pacific coast, and tell them they shall have my support for the measure that they have now before the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from Alabama for the broad and liberal view which he has taken of this question and which he has presented to the Senate. He has not presented the amendment which he suggested, and I wish to say a word or two in the hope that I may persuade him to withhold the amendment which he suggested and which, as I understood, he said he would feel it to be his duty to present, which was to the effect that it was not constitutional or if constitutional it was not expedient to admit States having formed the constitution provided for in the enabling act simply by the proclamation of the President.

I may say that all the argument which the Senator from Alabama has made in favor of the admission of Washington Territory as a State is an argument in favor of its immediate admission. The considerations which he urges in connection with our relations to Great Britain in favor of the admission of Washington Territory are considerations which apply to the present and to the immediate necessity of establishing a State government there which shall invite capital and invite immigration and stimulate the building up of a strong, healthy, powerful State upon that Pacific shore.

But this is not a new question, sir. If it were, the suggestion would come with greater force as it seems to me than it does now. If I understand the precedents as to the admission of recent States, they settle this method of admission by proclamation of the President when he finds that the conditions of the enabling act have been complied with. They settle that as a proper and constitutional method of the admission of States. It is true the Constitution provides that new States may be admitted by Congress into the Union; but we have had certainly three States now admitted without the requirement that the constitution provided for in the enabling act should be submitted to Congress, and that Congress should then decide whether the State should be admitted upon that constitution.

The first State I think in which the practice now proposed to be followed was adopted was the State of Nevada. I have looked hastily over the debate at the time of its admission, and I do not find that any suggestion was made at that time that it was an unconstitutional method of admitting a State into the Union to pass an enabling act requiring certain conditions as to matters which should be incorporated into the constitution of the State and then authorizing the President when he was satisfied that that was done to declare that the State was admitted into the Union and became one of the States. No suggestion of unconstitutionality was made at that time.

The next recognition of this method of admitting States into the Union was in the case of Nebraska. It is true that in the case of Nebraska the constitution provided for in the enabling act was brought to Congress and an act passed for its admission after the constitution had been submitted to Congress which was authorized to be adopted by the enabling act; but the act of admission required certain changes to be made in that constitution and prescribed a fundamental condition of its admission. It was in the third section of the act which admitted Nebraska, its constitution adopted under the enabling act having been brought here, and it was to this effect:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other rights, to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the legislation of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act; upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State, and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete.

So that the doctrine that a State might be admitted by proclamation of the President, having complied with the fundamental conditions required by the enabling act, was, as it seems to me, recognized in the admission of Nebraska.

Then came Colorado, the last State admitted, where there was an enabling act and a provision in that enabling act that the people of Colorado having in constitutional convention adopted a constitution such as was required in the enabling act, upon the governor certifying the same to the President he should by proclamation declare that Colorado had become a State in the Union.

So then the last three States which have been admitted have really been admitted upon the theory of this bill.

There is another consideration which I desire to present in favor of my suggestion that the Senator from Alabama withhold the amendment, and that is this: It seems to me that the people of Washington Territory have been long delayed in their right to admission. I do not say that Congress is to blame for it; I do not think it is. I do not think there has been any real opposition to the admission of Washington Territory of which it has a right to complain; but by reason of the difficulty of the transaction of business, the buffeting which every measure gets in each branch of Congress and between the two branches of Congress, we have never come to the point of acting upon this question of admission. The result is the same, that Washington is delayed.

Now if an amendment of this sort were to be adopted it must inevitably result in a delay of two or three years longer. I do not think it would be possible before the next session of Congress, which is a short session, to have a constitutional convention called, the constitution provided for by this enabling act adopted and submitted to the people for their ratification, and returned here in time to get action by the present Congress. That involves its being acted upon for the final admission of the State at the next Congress, and we all know how slowly business proceeds. To put an amendment of that sort on this bill I think I may justly say will operate to make a delay of at least three years before Washington Territory can be clothed with the full privileges of Statehood. And in view of the precedents which have been adopted, which amount to a legislative construction of the Constitution at any rate, it seems to me that this suggested amendment of the Senator from Alabama ought not to prevail. I trust he will not offer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Territories will be stated.

The Secretary read the first amendment of the Committee on Territories, which was in section 2, line 10, after the word "point," to strike out "twenty miles south of said parallel; thence due east," and to insert:

Due west of the headwaters of Rabbit Creek; thence due east to the headwaters of Rabbit Creek; thence down the middle of said Rabbit Creek to its junction with Salmon River; thence up the middle of said Salmon River to the junction of Horse Creek; thence up the middle of said Horse Creek to the junction of the East Fork of said creek; thence up the middle of said East Fork of Horse Creek.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That said State shall consist of all the territory embraced within the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning one marine league west from the mouth of the middle of the north ship-channel of the Columbia River; thence along the northern boundary of the State of Oregon, up said river to where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude intersects the same near the mouth of the Walla Walla River; thence east along said parallel to where it intersects the middle of the main channel of Snake River; thence southerly along said channel of Snake River to a point due west of the headwaters of Rabbit Creek; thence due east to the headwaters of Rabbit Creek; thence down the middle of said Rabbit Creek to its junction with Salmon River; thence up the middle of said Salmon River to the junction of Horse Creek; thence up the middle of said Horse Creek to the junction of the East Fork of said creek; thence up the middle of said East Fork of Horse Creek to the crest of the Bitter Root range of mountains; thence northwesterly along the crest of said mountains to where it intersects the thirty-ninth meridian west; thence north along said meridian to the boundary line between the United States and British Columbia; thence westerly along said line to a point one marine league west from the mouth of the middle channel of the Straits of Juan de Fuca; thence southerly a distance of one marine league west from the east shore of the Pacific Ocean to the place of beginning, including all islands and parts of islands within said boundaries within the jurisdiction of the United States, with concurrent jurisdiction on all rivers bordering on said State so far as such rivers form a common boundary to said State and any other State or Territory now or hereafter to be formed and bounded by the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 4, line 14, after the word "further," to strike out all down to and including the word "further," in line 49, as follows:

That such constitution shall provide that neither the money nor the credit of the State, or of any city, town, or other municipal corporation therein, shall be given or loaned to or in aid of any association, corporation, or private undertaking, and that the aggregate debt of the State shall not at any time exceed $200,000: And provided further, That the people of that portion of the Territory of Idaho embraced within the boundaries of said State shall in no wise be released from the payment of their just portion of the indebtedness of said Territory at the time of the admission of said State; and that the auditor of each county wholly or partly within such portion shall, as such indebtedness may become due and payable, draw his warrant or warrants on the treasurer of his county in favor of the treasurer of said Idaho Territory for such proportion of the net indebtedness of said Territory as the assessed valuation of the property therein shall then bear to the assessed valuation of all the property of said Territory and of said portion of said State, which warrants shall be paid as in other cases: And provided further, That all convicts confined in the penitentiary of Idaho Territory at the time of the admission of said State who at the time of their conviction of the crimes for which they are so confined were residents of that portion of said Territory embraced within the boundaries of said State shall be transferred to and confined in the penitentiary of said State for the remainder of their terms of sentence in the same manner and subject to the same laws and regulations as other convicts who are confined in said State penitentiary: And provided further, That all residents of that portion of said Territory embraced within the boundaries of said State at the time of admission who are confined in an insane asylum and who are maintained at such asylum at the expense of said Territory shall be received into the insane asylum of said State, and shall be maintained by said State upon the same terms, in the same manner, and under the same laws and regulations as the other insane of said State: And provided further.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the question on this may be divided and that the amendment down to the forty-second line may be first acted upon, and then I shall ask that the words from line 42 to line 49 be transferred to the end of the section. I do not know that there is any necessity for the adoption of an amendment in that regard; but the words from the forty-second to the forty-ninth line are simply to be transferred to the end of the section. I do not desire to strike out that clause entirely but to transfer it in the bill. In whatever way that can be reached in parliamentary method is what I desire to have accomplished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment so far as it strikes out the words down to the forty-second line will be considered agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. Before that result is announced I desire to say in explanation of the clause from the fourteenth to the nineteenth line, in regard to what the Constitution shall provide, inasmuch as I introduced this bill with that in, that the clause was inserted because it was contained in the bill as reported from the Committee on Territories at the last session. I do not care to make any objection to the amendment, but simply state that in explanation of the clause appearing in the bill as introduced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to line 42 will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. The words from line 42 to line 49 are transferred to the end of the section. It is immaterial how the result is arrived at. The desire is simply to transfer those words to the end of the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is already printed as an amendment at the end of the section; therefore the adoption of this amendment striking out these words in this place will accomplish the purpose of the Senator.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Territories was, in section 4, after the word "thereof," in line 65, to strike out the words:

Reserving to said State, nevertheless, the right to impose on such tide, swamp, and overflowed lands such regulations and burdens as to its Legislature may from time to time seem proper for the construction and maintenance of ditches, dikes, and other appliances for the reclamation, use, and occupation thereof, separately or with others.

So as to read:

That all grants and patents heretofore made by the United States to settlers and purchasers of tide, swamp, overflowed, and school lands therein are confirmed by said State and the people thereof, and that other lands, to be selected as hereinafter provided, are accepted by said State in lieu thereof; that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add to the fourth section the following proviso:

And provided further, That all residents of that portion of said Territory embraced within the boundaries of said State at the time of admission who are confined in an insane asylum, and who are maintained at such asylum at the expense of said Territory, shall be received into the insane asylum of said State, and shall be maintained by said State upon the same terms, in the same manner, and under the same laws and regulations as the other insane of said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 6, after the word "any," to strike out the word "two" and insert "three;" so as to read:

SEC. 6. That at the election last aforesaid the legal voters of said new State shall vote directly for or against such proposed constitution, and the returns thereof shall be made to the governor of Washington Territory, who, with the secretary and chief-justice thereof and the president of said convention, or any three of them, shall canvass the same, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, line 7, after the word "State," to strike out the words "shall constitute an entire county of Idaho Territory," and to insert, "shall be, and is hereby, annexed to Washington County;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That from and after the admission of said State as hereinbefore provided the government of the Territory of Idaho shall continue unimpaired, with the boundaries of said Territory so changed as to include only that portion thereof not embraced within the limits of said State; and the portion of Idaho County not embraced within the boundaries of the proposed State shall be, and is hereby, annexed to Washington County until otherwise provided by the laws of said Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, line 8, after the word "allowed," to strike out the words:

To other similar officers and persons performing similar duties by the laws of the United States, excepting such provision thereof as are specially applicable to some particular officer or district.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

By law in the State of Oregon to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties.

So as to read:

SEC. 14. That the marshal, district attorney, and clerk of the circuit and district courts of said district of Washington, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall for the services they may perform receive the fees and compensation allowed by law in the State of Oregon to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 15, after the word "Idaho," to insert the words "which arose within that part of said Territory of Idaho which will form part of said State of Washington;" and in line 13, before the word "or," to strike out the word "aforesaid" and to insert the words "herein provided for;" so as to read:

SEC. 15. That all cases of writ of error or appeal heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, or the supreme court of the Territory of Idaho, which arose within that part of said Territory of Idaho which will form part of said State of Washington, or that hereafter may be lawfully prosecuted from either of said courts, may be heard and determined by said Supreme Court of the United States; and where the same arose within the limits of said State, the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court herein provided for, or to the supreme court of said State, as the nature of the case may require, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out section, 25 as follows:

SEC. 25. That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve, with six sections of land adjoining or as contiguous as may be to each of them, to be selected as aforesaid, without impairing any prior right or interest of any person or persons therein, are hereby likewise granted to said State for school purposes.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to know the object of this amendment. That provision is contained in nearly all the other acts for the admission of States into the Union; and if it should be stricken out here, and there are salt springs in the Territory, of which I am not informed, the State would simply come here for relief, as all the other States do come when there is any omission made in the enabling act or the act admitting the State for grants similar to those made to the other States.

Mr. PLATT. The committee made all the inquiry it was possible to make, and could not learn that there were any salt springs within the State. That is a provision which seems to have crept into the enabling acts which have been passed from time to time, originating within those Territories where salt springs were really to be found; and it hardly seems worth while or proper to continue such a provision in an enabling act in a Territory where we could not learn from any inquiry that we were able to make that there were any salt springs at all.

Mr. INGALLS. If that provision is left in there will be plenty of salt springs. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to know how generally that provision has been retained in the enabling acts.

Mr. PLATT. I am obliged to confess that it has been in all of them, and I think there have been some abuses under it. I think it has never been left out of an enabling act before; but I think there have been some abuses under it, or if not abuses, that there have been certain lands donated on the ground that there were salt springs there when there was really not very much reason for thinking so; and in a Territory where I do not suppose it is claimed that any salt springs exist I think we should make the precedent of leaving it out.

Mr. DOLPH. There are salt springs just on the south of the Columbia River in Oregon, and there may be in Washington. If there are none, then this provision will do no harm. If there are salt springs the State ought to be put on an equality with the other States. If there should be some questionable patenting of lands under this provision, still, as it goes to the support of common schools, and the land can only be sold at $5 an acre, which constitutes an irreducible school fund, I do not think any great harm would be done by retaining the section; and I think if it is left out of this act, very likely we shall have an application by the new State for the grant directly after the State is admitted.

Mr. PLATT. Would it not be better to leave it in that way, so that if salt springs should be actually found there and the State came and asked for them, that question should be passed upon by Congress, rather than keep a provision in this bill which has become obsolete practically?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Territories was, in section [27] 26, after the word "act," in line 1, to strike out:

Except such as have been sold pursuant to the provisions of the act passed by the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory on January 23, 1863, which sales are hereby confirmed.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 26. That the lands granted by this act shall not be sold for less than $5 per acre; and the proceeds of those granted for school purposes, as well as all moneys paid to said State under the provisions of the preceding section, shall constitute a permanent fund, the interest only of which shall be expended for the support of the public schools therein.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to offer an amendment in a little different language, to come in at another place in the bill, accomplishing this same object as the clause here stricken out. I should not like to be precluded by the vote on this amendment. If it is in order, I will move an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order in the Senate to reserve this amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. Would it be in order to move to insert something else in lieu of the words stricken out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be in order now to move to amend the paragraph proposed to be stricken out, but in a different place in the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon to permit the Senator from Connecticut having charge of the bill to proceed with the amendments of the committee, and he can offer his amendment in the Senate when the bill is reported.

Mr. PLATT. I do not object to what the Senator from Oregon desires to have incorporated in the bill by way of amendment substantially like this clause that the committee has asked to be stricken out, for upon explanation by the Senator from Oregon I think the purpose of that enactment should be preserved in the bill. His amendment is in a little different language from the words of the original bill, and I think the question may as well be taken now, that he may submit his amendment and perfect the text of the bill, and then I should be willing to have his amendment adopted.

Mr. DOLPH. With that understanding I will send up my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is that an amendment to the text of the bill? If so, by unanimous consent it may be offered now. The rule requires amendments of the committee to be acted on first, but if there is no objection——

Mr. DOLPH. This is the last amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I think we had better proceed with the amendments of the committee and get through with them, and then the Senator can offer his amendment. It is interfering with the orderly course of the bill to interpose other amendments. I object to it at this time.

Mr. DOLPH. I am not particular.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be open to amendment after the amendments of the committee are completed.

Mr. DOLPH. I only rose to a question of order. The amendment offered by me is substantially the same in effect, although not exactly so in language, as the clause proposed by the pending amendment to be stricken out of the bill. If there is no parliamentary objection to my amendment being entertained after the amendment of the committee is acted on, I have no objection to waiting until that is done.

Mr. PLATT. Certainly the Senator can do it when the bill is reported to the Senate; but I have no doubt unanimous consent will be given now to offer the amendment in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Territories.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. Now I offer my amendment. After the word "acre," in line 6 of section [27] 26, I move to insert:

Provided, That all lands sold under the provisions of an act passed by the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory January 23, 1863, are hereby confirmed to the purchasers.

In explanation of this amendment I will say that at an early day, in 1863, there was an act passed authorizing the board of county commissioners of any county in Washington Territory to sell at private sale such portions of sections 16 and 36 as were prior to settlement and before survey in the bona fide possession of any person at the time of the approval of the act. Therefore persons who had taken donation claims or pre-emption claims upon sections 16 and 36 were allowed to purchase of the Territory those lands at a given price, the purchase price of which went into the school fund of the Territory, the Legislature of the Territory supposing at the time that the legislation in the organic act of the Territory amounted to a grant and that they might dispose of the lands.

The persons who bought these lands over twenty years ago have improved them and they are now valuable. In the present bill it is provided that none of the lands granted to the Territory for school purposes shall be sold for less than $5 an acre. I think these lands were sold for $2; therefore this amendment is necessary in order that the title of the persons who have purchased these lands of the Territory may be confirmed at the price which they paid. It will not increase the grant to the Territory because the title to the Territory is confirmed by this act to sections 16 and 36. They will not be entitled to lien lands; but it will simply enable them to confirm the sale at $2 an acre, whereas the rest can not be sold for less than $5. The amount is quite small, but there are enough persons interested in the matter to make it important that the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senator whether it does not answer his purpose to put in the amendment at the close of the section? It seems to me the section would read better to have the amendment adopted at the end of the section. It will read then:

That the lands granted by this act shall not be sold for less than $5 per acre.

And then the proviso would come in at the end of the section.

Mr. DOLPH. I am not particular where it comes in. I will modify my amendment in that way.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator offers it to come in at the end of the section I will accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is modified to come in at the end of the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. Now, I offer as an amendment to add to section 4 of the bill the following:

And provided further, That the people of that portion of Idaho Territory which is by this act made a part of the State of Washington shall in no wise be released from the payment of a pro rata proportion of the bonded indebtedness of Idaho Territory. That within sixty days after the admission of Washington under this act, the State auditor of Washington and the Territorial comptroller and treasurer of Idaho shall meet at the office of the comptroller and treasurer of Idado, in Boisé City, Idaho Territory, and shall ascertain and determine from the books and records in said office the exact amount, as near as may be, of the bonded indebtedness of said Idaho Territory at that date, and the time when the same, or any and every portion thereof, shall come due, and shall deduct therefrom the amount of money on hand in the Territorial treasury of Idaho at that time. They shall ascertain from the last assessment-rolls the whole amount of taxable property in Idaho Territory, including all of that portion of Idaho that is annexed to Washington by this act; and they shall apportion a pro rata proportion of the balance of the bonded indebtedness of Idaho Territory to each of the counties or parts of counties that are by this act detached from Idaho and annexed to Washington, upon the basis that the taxable property in said counties or parts of counties bear to the whole amount of taxable property in Idaho Territory; and the auditor of each county or part of county so detached from Idaho shall each draw a warrant on the county treasurer of each county for the proportion so allotted to them to pay, in favor of the Territorial treasurer of Idaho Territory, which warrants shall draw the same rate of interest as the bonded debt, and shall be made payable, both principal and interest, at the same time and on the same terms as the bonded indebtedness as computed.

In explanation of this amendment I will say that I have received letters from residents of Northern Idaho protesting against a measure which will make the people of the northern portion of the Territory which is to be incorporated within the new State of Washington pay their pro rata share of the present bonded indebtedness of Idaho Territory. That is supposed to be about $75,000 for the whole Territory, and the portion of the debt which the people of Northern Idaho would pay under this provision would be somewhere from seventeen to eighteen thousand dollars. The memorial of the Idaho Legislature which I had read at the desk during my remarks on the bill to-day, praying for the annexation of the northern portion of Idaho to Washington, and which was adopted, I believe, by a substantially unanimous vote in that Legislature, asked that when Northern Idaho was annexed to Washington it should be required to pay its pro rata share of the indebtedness. I understand also that a large proportion of this indebtedness is for new public buildings which were provided for by an act of the Territorial Legislature and that the representatives in the council and the members of the house from Northern Idaho could have prevented the incurring of this indebtedness, but they concurred in making it.

I do not know what the just rule would be in such cases. I do not know what the precedents are, where a Territory or State is divided, in regard to the indebtedness of that portion of the State or Territory which retains the name of the old corporation.

I do not propose to submit anything further in regard to it except to ask to have read a letter from Delegate HAILEY, of Idaho Territory, to myself in answer to inquiries concerning the matter. I will state that this provision is incorporated in the bill which has recently passed the House and has been referred to the Committee on Territories of the Senate for the annexation of Northern Idaho to Washington Territory, and undoubtedly, if this bill goes to the House without such a provision, there will be an attempt made in the House to attach such an amendment to the bill.

Now, as I say, I myself am not positive as to what ought to be done in the matter, and after submitting this letter I am ready that the question shall be taken by the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the matter of the northern counties of Idaho which it is proposed to annex to Washington Territory, or rather to admit with Washington into the Union as a State, I have no objection to these counties going to Washington provided they pay their pro rata proportion of the bonded debt of Idaho and their pro rata proportion of the cost of keeping such Territorial prisoners as are under sentence, and take with them the insane people, who are now being kept at the expense of Idaho, who were sent from those counties. As for the latter class, there seems to be no question but that Washington should take them. Why there should be any objection to Washington paying a pro rata share of the cost of keeping the prisoners I can not see. These northern counties had the protection of the laws of Idaho extended over that portion of the Territory, and they made a liberal contribution of prisoners to the penitentiary from those counties. Every Territorial prisoner costs the Territories 75 cents per day per head for keeping and maintaining. They are kept by the United States by contract at the above rate, and the Territory derives no income whatever from them. These northern counties have not only furnished a reasonable amount of the prisoners, but have had a voice in the making of the laws for Idaho to the extent of one-fourth of the members of each House of the Legislative Assembly of Idaho. And last, but not least, I can see no good reason why these northern counties should not pay their pro rata proportion of the bonded debt of Idaho Territory, which debt was created by the approval and assistance of the unanimous vote of the members representing those northern counties at the last session of the Legislative Assembly in Idaho, namely, thirteenth session, 1884–1885.

The act creating this bonded debt, which is unpaid, amounting to $100,000, will be found in the thirteenth session laws of 1884 and 1885, commencing on page 62 and ending on page 71, the title of which is: "An act to provide for the erection of a capitol building in Boisé City, the capital of Idaho Territory, and to provide for the erection of an insane asylum in or near the town of Blackfoot, the county seat of Bingham County, and for the maintenance thereof, and for other purposes."

Without troubling you to read the whole of this act, I desire to call your attention to the particular sections that authorize the issuance of the bonds, which are as follows:

Section 6 authorizes the issuance of $80,000 in bonds to sell for money to erect a capitol building, which has been done.

Section 23 authorizes the issuance of $20,000 in bonds for the purpose of erecting and equipping an insane asylum. All of these bonds have been issued and the buildings are built, but not furnished, and the debt is unpaid.

The Legislature that created this debt consisted of thirty-six members, twelve in the council and twenty-four in the lower house. Of this number the northern counties that now desire to be annexed to Washington had three members in the council, namely: Mr. Moody, Mr. Isaman, and Mr. Poage. In the house they had six members, namely: Messrs. Cleary, King, McKeon, Quarles, Williams, and Wilmot.

Each and every one of these members voted for the passage of this bill creating this debt of $100,000, as shown by the journals of each house. (See Council Journal, pages 205 and 206; see House Journal, pages 224 and 225.)

It may be said the bill would have passed without the votes of these northern members. It will be observed that the house passed this bill on the fifty-seventh day of the session, just three days before time for them to adjourn—it was passed under a suspension of the rules. Had the northern members voted against the suspension of the rules the bill would never have been reached or passed.

They, as the accredited representatives of the northern counties, voted for this bill with the understanding that the northern counties would have to pay a pro rata proportion of this debt, whether they remained in Idaho or were annexed to Washington. At this same session of the Legislature of Idaho Mr. Moody, councilman from the northern counties, introduced council joint memorial No. 2 (see Thirteenth Session Laws, pages 211 and 212), praying the Congress of the United States to annex these northern counties to Washington Territory when said Territory was admitted into the Union as a State. The closing paragraph of this memorial reads as follows:

"And we would further ask that in the event of the disintegration of the part of Idaho Territory mentioned that the common debt be adjusted and provisions made for the support of such convicts as are now in the Territorial penitentiary, and for the support of such persons as are adjudged insane in said counties of Idaho, Kootenai, Shoshone, and Nez Percés."

Council journal, page 74, shows that Mr. Moody introduced this memorial.

Council journal, pages 95 and 96, shows that the members from the northern counties in the council all voted for the memorial, namely, Mr. Moody, Mr. Isaman, and Mr. Poage.

House journal, page 97, shows that each of the members of the house from the northern counties voted for this memorial, namely, Messrs. Clery, King, McKern, Quarles, Williams, and Wilmot.

The public buildings that were erected by the creation of this debt were erected for the benefit of the people of the whole of Idaho Territory. They are sufficient to accommodate the people of the whole Territory for the purposes for which they were erected.

The representatives of the northern counties by their votes helped to create the debt. They have said by their votes for the memorial that if we go to Washington we are willing to pay our share. For the northern counties to help saddle this debt on the tax-payers of Idaho and then leave without paying any portion of it is, I insist, wrong.

The whole amount of taxable property in Idaho in 1885 was only $15,497,598; of this amount the counties it is proposed to annex to Washington have $3,344,664. Property-holders in Idaho are compelled to pay high taxes now, from 2½ to 4 per cent., in order to pay Territorial and county expenses and to keep up our free-school system.

Let the people of the northern counties pay their proportion of the Territorial liabilities which they helped to make, then I am willing for them to go to Washington; otherwise I must insist on them remaining in Idaho until our debts are all paid.

Very respectfully,

JOHN HAILEY, Delegate.

Senator J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HARRISON. It may be that the people of the Pan Handle of Idaho should make some contributions to the debt of Idaho Territory, but I think it very clear that they should not make the contribution proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

I have in my hand a statement sent me by the governor of Idaho, of date December 1, 1885, showing the exact indebtedness of the Territory. It is as follows:

Bonds, act of 1875	$22,533 54
Bonds, act of 1877	46,715 06
Insane-asylum bonds, act of 1885	20,000 00
Capitol-building bonds, act of 1885	65,000 00
Making a total of	154,248 60

There is cash on hand in the treasury of Idaho, $98,187.08. But of this sum there is belonging to the capitol-building fund as proceeds of the sale of bonds $32,738.88, and also from proceeds of sale of asylum bonds $14,852.25. These two items make a total of $47,591.13, leaving a cash balance in the treasury derived from other sources of $50,596.95. It appears also from this statement that $15,000 of the capitol bonds authorized to be issued have not yet been issued.

I sent for the acts of 1875 and 1877 with a view of determining the origin of the loans referred to here, but I find that both of those acts were mere refunding acts, and do not disclose the purpose for which the indebtedness was originally created. That purpose, however, is disclosed by the communication which has just been read at the desk.

I think we may assume, then, upon the information we have, that the total indebtedness of Idaho Territory was created for the purpose of erecting public buildings, namely, a capitol building and an insane asylum. Those buildings, which as I suppose and understand have been partly paid for by a general tax upon the whole Territory, remain in the Territory of Idaho. The people of Northern Idaho, from the moment their annexation to Washington is complete, are cut off from all benefit growing out of the erection of those buildings; they will partake no further in the use of them, and they will become at once subject to assessment for the construction of a capitol building, insane asylums, and other benevolent, reformatory, and penal institutions in the State of Washington.

It seems to me that if it can be argued that some part of this indebtedness ought under the circumstances to be borne by the Pan Handle of Idaho, it is clear that its people ought not to continue to be assessed for the whole of it; and as I suppose they have already made a considerable contribution in the way of taxes to the erection of both the buildings in Southern Idaho and are to leave the buildings for the use of Idaho, it seems to me that they have made a sufficient contribution.

I do not think the argument of the paper that because the delegates from the counties of the Pan Handle voted in the Idaho council for the construction of the buildings that puts them under obligation to continue to pay until the buildings are completed and the bonds are all redeemed is sound, when by this act of annexation they are to be deprived of any use of the buildings.

I do not know upon the information we have that we can so modify the amendment as to apportion to the Pan Handle such just part of the debt as it ought to pay. We can not know what would be a just part unless we know how much they have already paid.

I think, therefore, the amendment in the shape in which it is proposed ought not to be adopted. It would saddle a burden upon those counties and compel them to participate in paying a debt of $154,000 for buildings which are retained by Idaho Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOLPH. I now move, at the end of section 4, to add the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the said State shall be liable for and shall pay to the Territory the cost of keeping the Territorial prisoners of the Territory of Idaho, under sentence and imprisoned at the date of the passage of this act, who, at the time of conviction and sentence, were residents of that portion of said Territory embraced within the boundaries of said State, to the expiration of their terms of sentence; and the Territorial comptroller and Territorial treasurer of Idaho Territory, on the 1st day of each month, shall make out an itemized bill of the cost of keeping said portion of prisoners, and shall certify to the correctness thereof, and forward the same to the auditor of the State of Washington, who shall draw his warrant on the treasurer of said State, in favor of the Territorial treasurer of Idaho Territory, for the amount thereof, not to exceed the cost rate of maintaining and keeping said proportion of prisoners at the date of the passage of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. DOLPH. Whatever doubt I had concerning the propriety of the amendment which has just been voted down by the Senate, I have none whatever as to the propriety of this amendment. I see no reason why the prisoners, who were residents of the Pan Handle of Idaho at the time they were convicted and are now serving out unexpired terms of sentence, should not be kept at the expense of the people of that portion of the Territory until the end of their term. Certainly the obligation is the same as the obligation of the people of that portion of the Territory to keep the insane which were sent to the asylum from that portion of the Territory. There can be no doubt, in my judgment, as to the justness of this amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. Are the amendments offered by the Committee on Territories disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are all disposed of.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to offer the amendment of which I gave notice the other day, and I ask that it be read.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Indiana having offered his amendment, so that it is now pending, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should be glad to have the amendment which I have offered printed in the RECORD, without taking up the time to have it read. It is brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to printing the amendment in the RECORD without being read? ["No objection."]

The amendment of Mr. VOORHEES is to add at the end of the bill the following additional sections:

SEC. 28. That the inhabitants of the Territory of Montana are hereby authorized to form for themselves a State government, with the name of the State of Montana.

SEC. 29. That said State shall consist of all the territory embraced within the boundaries of said Territory as now defined by law

SEC. 30. That in order to the formation of such State government the qualified electors resident within said boundaries are hereby authorized, after due proclamation by the governor of Montana Territory, and in conformity to the laws of said Territory relative to the election of members of the Legislative Assembly thereof, as nearly as practicable, and in so far as they may be applicable, and under such rules and regulations, and at such time and places, as said governor may prescribe, to elect as many delegates, possessing the qualifications of such electors, within the present limits of said Territory as there are members of said Legislative Assembly, and also fifteen such delegates at large.

SEC. 31. That said delegates shall meet in convention at the city of Helena, in said Territory, at such time as said governor may designate in his said proclamation, and, when organized, shall declare, on behalf of the people of the territory embraced within said boundaries, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; and thereupon said convention is hereby authorized to form a constitution and State government for said territory so bounded and described as aforesaid: Provided, nevertheless, That such constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil and political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence: Provided further, That said convention shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship; that the inhabitants of the territory embraced within said boundaries do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands, and the lands the Indian title to which has not been extinguished by the United States, lying therein, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; that all grants and patents heretofore made by the United States to settlers and purchasers of school lands therein are confirmed by said State and the people thereof, and that other lands, to be selected as hereinafter provided, are accepted by said State in lieu thereof; that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof; that no tax shall be imposed by said State on lands or property therein belonging to the United States, any Indian tribe, or Indian sustaining tribal relations, or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States; and that all navigable waters within said State shall be and remain public highways, free to all citizens of the United States: And provided further, That all residents of that portion of said Territory embraced within the boundaries of said State at the time of admission who are confined in an insane asylum, and who are maintained at such asylum at the expense of said Territory, shall be received into the insane asylum of said State, and shall be maintained by said State upon the same terms, in the same manner, and under the same laws and regulations as the other insane of said State.

SEC. 32. That said convention, having formed such constitution as provided in this act, shall provide by ordinance for submitting the same to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at such time and places and under such regulations as said convention may prescribe.

SEC. 33. That at the election last aforesaid the legal voters of said new State shall vote directly for or against such proposed constitution, and the returns thereof shall be made to the governor of Montana Territory, who, with the secretary and chief-justice thereof and the president of said convention, or any three of them, shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes so cast in said proposed State shall be for said constitution, said governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances.

SEC. 34. That on receipt of such certification of the votes so cast at said election showing the adoption of said constitution by the people of said State as aforesaid, and of a copy of such constitution and ordinances, the President of the United States, if said constitution and ordinances shall conform to the requirements of this act, shall issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union, and thereupon the said State shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action on the part of Congress.

SEC. 35. That until the next general census said State shall be entitled to one Representative in Congress.

SEC. 36. That such Representative, and the governor and other officers that may be provided for in the constitution of said State, shall be elected on a day to be fixed by said constitutional convention, and which may be the same as the one fixed for the submission of the proposed constitution to the people for ratification or rejection as aforesaid; and that until said State officers are elected and qualified the Territorial officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 37. That from and after the admission of said State into the Union in pursuance of this act, the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within the said State as elsewhere within the United States; and said State shall constitute one judicial district, and be called the district of Montana; that for said district a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney of the United States shall be appoined by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with the same rights, powers, and duties and provided by law for similar officers in the other districts, except as herein otherwise provided; that said district of Montana shall be attached to and constitute a part of the ninth judicial circuit; and a term of the circuit court and district court for said district shall be held at the seat of government in said State on the first Tuesdays of January and June in each year; and one grand jury and one petit jury only shall be summoned and serve in both of said courts.

SEC. 38. That the circuit and district courts for the district of Montana, and the judges thereof, respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction and perform the same duties possessed and required to be performed by the other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations.

SEC. 39. That the district judge appointed for the district of Montana shall receive as his compensation the sum of $3,500 per annum, payable in four equal installments, on the first days of January, April, July, and October of each year.

SEC. 40. That the marshal, district attorney, and clerk of the circuit and district courts of said district of Montana, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall for the services they may perform receive the fees and compensation allowed by law in the State of Oregon to other similar officers and persons performing similar duties.

SEC. 41. That all cases of writ of error or appeal heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Montana, or that hereafter may be lawfully prosecuted from either of said courts, may be heard and determined by said Supreme Court of the United States; and where the same arose within the limits of said State, the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court herein provided for, or to the supreme court of said State, as the nature of the case may require; and each of said last-mentioned courts shall be the successor of the supreme courts of said Territory as to all such cases, with full power to proceed with the same and to award mesne or final process therein; and that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of said Territory, rendered prior to the admission of said State, the parties to such judgments and decrees shall have the same right to prosecute writs of error and appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States as they shall have had prior to such admission; and as to all such cases arising within the limits of said State, the like subsequent proceedings shall be had therein as aforesaid.

SEC. 42. That in respect of all cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the Territory of Montana, at the time of the admission of said State into the Union, arising within the limits of said State, whereof the circuit or district court by this act established might have had jurisdiction under the laws of the United States had such courts existed at the time of the commencement of such cases, the said circuit and district courts, respectively, shall be the successors of said supreme and district courts of said Territory; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating thereto shall be transferred to said circuit and district courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law: Provided, however, That in all civil actions, causes, and proceedings in which the United States is not a party such transfer shall not be made except upon the written request of one of the parties to such action or proceeding filed in the proper court.

SEC. 43. That the Legislature provided for in said constitution shall have the power to provide, by an act to that effect, for the transfer of all actions, cases, proceedings, and matters pending in the supreme or district courts of the Territory of Montana, at the time of the admission of said State into the Union, arising within the limits of said State, and not included within the provisions of the foregoing section, to such courts as shall be established under the constitution to be thus formed; and no indictment, action, or proceeding shall abate by reason of any change in the courts, but the same shall be transferred to and proceeded with in the State courts according to the laws thereof.

SEC. 44. That sections 16 and 36 in every township within said State, or in case any of said lands have been disposed of under the provisions of any act of Congress to settlers or purchasers from the United States, or in case any of said sections 16 and 36 are fractional in quantity, or wanting by reason of the township being fractional, or shall be found, when surveyed, to be mineral lands, other lands equivalent in quantity thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than 40 acres, to be selected within said State as the constitution and Legislature thereof may provide, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, are hereby granted to said State, when admitted, for school purposes.

SEC. 45. That the grant of 500,000 acres of unappropriated lands of the United States made to said State, on its admission, by the provisions of section 2378 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may be used for school purposes; and said land shall be selected within said State as provided in the preceding section of this act.

SEC. 46. That seventy-two other sections of the unappropriated non-mineral public lands of the United States within said State, to be so selected as aforesaid, are hereby likewise granted to said State for the use and support of an agricultural college and for the promotion of industrial science therein.

SEC. 47. That fifty other sections of such lands, to be selected as aforesaid, are hereby likewise granted to said State for the erection and maintenance of suitable public buildings at the seat of government thereof, when permanently located, for legislative, executive, and judicial purposes.

SEC. 48. That ten other sections of such lands, to be selected as aforesaid, are hereby likewise granted to said State for the erection of a State penitentiary therein.

SEC. 49. That ten other sections of such lands, to be selected as aforesaid, are hereby likewise granted to said State for the erection of an asylum for the insane therein.

SEC. 50. That 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State shall be paid to said State for school purposes.

SEC. 51. That the lands granted by this act shall not be sold for less than $5 per acre; and the proceeds of those granted for school purposes, as well as all moneys paid to said State under the provisions of the preceding section, shall constitute a permanent fund, the interest only of which shall be expended for the support of the public schools therein.

SEC. 52. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall ascertain and audit the expenses incident to the formation of said constitution and the submission of the same to the people of said proposed State, including such compensation to the officers and members of said convention as is allowed to the officers and members of the Territorial Legislature; and the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment thereof: Provided, That any money hereby appropriated not necessary for such purpose shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States:

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

APPORTIONMENT OF DIRECT TAX.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a statement of account showing the apportionment of the direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861, among, and assessment upon and collections from, the respective States and Territories; also showing claims and set-offs applied on such tax, with other information respecting said account; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PENITENTIARY, WYOMING TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Attorney-General recommending an appropriation for the enlargement and repair of the penitentiary in Wyoming Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF CERTAIN EXECUTIVE DOCUMENTS.

The following communications, heretofore submitted to the House and referred, were severally ordered to be printed, namely:

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information respecting the employment of substitutes in the several Departments; and

A letter from the Attorney-General, in reference to the same subject.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TRIGG, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BRADY, for two days, for the purpose of attending to important business.

REFERENCE OF SENATE RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER, in accordance with the rule, laid before the House Senate concurrent resolutions; which were severally referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the National Academy of Sciences for 1885, with its appendices, be printed in the usual octavo form, but that the eight accompanying memoirs be printed in quarto form, and that 4,500 additional copies of the report and memoirs be printed; of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the National Academy of Sciences.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, Grinnell Land, by First Lieut. A. W. Greely, Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, acting signal officer, be printed, and that 4,500 additional copies with the necessary illustrations be printed; 1,250 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 750 copies for distribution by the Signal Service Bureau.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLEY. I find in the RECORD this morning in the early stages of the debate on yesterday my friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], who now approaches me, is reported as having said:

> When we had under consideration here the bill for prohibiting the importation of contract labor the gentleman made the identical speech—pronounced the measure "buncombe," and said it would not work.

My friend from Missouri was slightly mistaken in that statement; but as I did not hear such a remark myself, and gentlemen around me say that none of them heard it, I did not respond as I would have done——

Mr. HAMMOND. I submit that this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I think if he will wait he will see that it is a question of privilege. I ask him to hear me for a moment; for I appear to have answered——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide when the gentleman makes his statement whether he presents a question of privilege or not.

Mr. KELLEY. In the RECORD I appear to have rejoined:

> I will vote for any bill for the relief of oppressed labor; but I will not vote for this mass of words unless my vote be accompanied with this notice that the bill means nothing.

So that, Mr. Speaker, I appear by my silence to have acquiesced in the statement of the gentleman from Missouri as to my conduct on that other occasion, while the truth of the matter is, sir——

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I now insist upon the point of order. The gentleman does not present a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that the gentleman has so far presented any question involving one of privilege under the rules of the House. It appears to be rather in the nature of a personal explanation.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I ask that the gentleman have the privilege of making his statement.

Mr. RANDALL. But if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is improperly placed by language in the RECORD he certainly should have the right of correcting it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask for objection. Is there objection to a brief explanation by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HAMMOND. I have no objection if the gentleman asks unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. I supposed I was asking unanimous consent.

Mr. HAMMOND. Because I have insisted and must insist that this does not present a question of privilege, and that the gentleman can only proceed by consent.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I ask consent of the House to make a brief explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. Now, sir, it is true that I suggested that the bill before the House was crude; but I indicated the amendment by which it might be perfected. That my suggestion in that regard was a correct one is established by the fact, as the RECORD shows, that the friends of the bill, the gentlemen in charge of it, adopted the amendment I suggested, which amendment had been prepared by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] while I spoke.

To show that I did not pronounce the bill buncombe, I ask the Clerk to read two brief passages I have marked, or I will read them myself; the reading will not occupy three minutes:

Sir, when the lawmakers of the United States, national, State, and municipal, shall fail to regard and provide for the social well-being of the laboring classes there will be an end to enlightened republican institutions, and instead of property being made safe by the sympathies of intelligent and aspiring laborers dwelling around the capitalists and property-owners, you will by the importation of cheap labor in the persons of the worst classes of the least enlightened states of Europe convert every industrial center into a nest of vipers and ferocious wild beasts. There is no law of nature that will exclude all the horrors which characterized the outbreak of 1793 and the French Revolution from any part of American soil when the masses of the American people shall have been degraded to the condition in which the French toilers then were.

The safety of capital and of enterprise in this country is not found in a standing army; for we have none. It is not found in armed police coextensive with the country or even with our great industrial centers; for we have it not, and we have not the means of providing such protective agencies. Our army for the protection of order and social well-being is found in well-housed, sufficiently fed, reasonably well-educated, hopeful, and aspiring working people; and while we maintain these conditions we shall continue to demonstrate to the world that that government is strongest and most secure which relies most confidently upon the affection and confidence of its people without armed or other organized restraint.

As to the power to pass the bill I made this brief remark:

Can we prohibit such immigration? We have the general-welfare clause put at us every now and again. And should I fail to find the power elsewhere in the Constitution, I would invoke the general-welfare clause in behalf of the laborers of the country.

I supported the bill all the way through. It could be amended. The bill of the gentleman means nothing, and can not have life breathed into it by an amendment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent to take a bill from the Private Calendar and bring it before the House for present consideration.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I desire, in justice to myself, to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER] has been recognized to ask unanimous consent to bring a bill before the House for consideration. The gentleman from Missouri, if he desires it, will be recognized hereafter.

MARY E. CASEY.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5003) for the relief of Mary E. Casey, and to bring it before the House for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Mary E. Casey, of Richardson County, Nebraska, or her legal representatives or assigns, may select and shall be allowed a patent for 120 acres of the unoccupied and unappropriated public lands of the United States in the State of Nebraska, not mineral in character, and in tracts not less than the subdivisions provided for in the United States land laws, and if unsurveyed when taken, to conform when surveyed to the general system of the United States land surveys; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be authorized to issue scrip, in legal subdivisions, to the said Mary E. Casey, or her legal representatives, in accordance with the provisions of this act, which scrip shall be received in payment for said land.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska whether this bill has been reported by a committee?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. It is the unanimous report of a committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. What committee?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. The Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much is involved in it?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. A patent for 120 acres of one-dollar-and-a-quarter land, which has been paid for, as the report shows.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not propose to object to the consideration of this bill, but I wish to say that I will ask unanimous consent to have one hour each Friday to consider private bills in this manner.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be allowed a word of explanation as to the character of this bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Nebraska can make a brief statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. The facts in relation to this bill are these: An Indian reservation was sold in the State of Nebraska. This woman was the purchaser of 80 acres. There was a contest, and she was unable to follow that contest. She paid the price, $133, eight years ago. This bill is to give her 120 acres of one-dollar-and-a-quarter land in lieu of that money, which is in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Do I understand there were 80 acres which she received before?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. That was a purchase; it was sold to the highest bidder.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Who reported this bill?

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. The gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. DORSEY.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to my friend from Nebraska one modification to his bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not yet before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the land to be taken should be taken from the regular surveys.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana is agreed to I will make no objection.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the bill is before the House for consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 9, 10, and 11, strike out the words:

"And if unsurveyed when taken, to conform when surveyed to the general system of the United States land surveys."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM FISHER.

Mr. CABELL. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7470) for the relief of William Fisher and that the same be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $231.30, being the amount of revenue tax imposed by law upon William Fisher, of Franklin County, Virginia, for the manufacture, &c., of 257 gallons of distilled spirits which were destroyed by fire at the house of said Fisher, in said county, on the 11th day of March, 1885, without fault or negligence upon his part, and the interest and penalties imposed for the non-payment of said tax, be, and the same are hereby, released and remitted to him; and if, prior to the passage of this act, the whole or any part of said tax, interest, or penalties shall have been paid by him, then the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to refund and repay to the said William Fisher the sum or sums of money so paid by him by reason of the liabilities hereinbefore mentioned.

Mr. CABELL. This bill was reported unanimously by the Ways and Means Committee. If any gentleman desires to hear the report the Clerk can read it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CABELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SILVER DOLLARS IN MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to ask the present consideration and passage of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it is complained by responsible business men of Massachusetts that the agents of the subtreasury at Boston refuse to pay out to them silver dollars when requested: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House whether silver dollars are refused to be paid out when requested by the business men of Massachusetts; and, if so, for what reason.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, that is the unanimous report of the committee, and I ask its adoption.

Mr. LONG. I should like to hear the report read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to whom was referred the foregoing resolution, report the same back favorably, and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, how is that a privileged report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was occupied when it was being read, but supposed it was a resolution of inquiry. If it is a resolution of inquiry it is privileged under the rules of the House.

Mr. BLAND. The resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], and the committee unanimously recommend its passage.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I now ask that the regular order, the labor arbitration bill, be now taken up, and I move that when next the House goes into Committee of the Whole upon the bill an order be made that general debate close at 3 o'clock p. m. to-day.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend that by making the hour 4 o'clock.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés; and, pending that motion, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] moves that general debate upon the bill be closed at 4 o'clock p. m. to-day. The question is on the latter motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 23.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

LABOR-ARBITRATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of the controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the statement of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that this House has reached a point in legislation which will prove to be of great importance in the history of this country. Certainly within my recollection no more important subject has ever been presented to the Congress of the United States. From some cause or other for the last ten years difficulties between labor and capital have been prevalent from one end of this land to the other. Those representing the respective interests have each charged that the other side was responsible for the troubles. On this occasion and during this discussion we have heard the same charges made. I apprehend that it is not for us to decide here upon the question which side is responsible for these difficulties. We are not here to consider this question, if we consider it wisely, either as a labor question or as a capital question. We should not undertake to become the advocates of either labor organizations or corporate organizations, but we should treat this as a great political question, involving the rights of the people of the whole country. The bills presented before this House seek, or profess to seek; to remedy certain evils, and for that purpose they propose a system of arbitration. I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that arbitration, if it means arbitration in the correct sense, is unconstitutional; but I do not agree with him that it is not within the power of Congress to legislate upon this subject.

It will be remembered that each one of these corporations classed as common carriers are quasi-political. Each one of them exercises the sovereign right of eminent domain. Each one of them possesses the power to condemn and to take possession of private property, and by that means to acquire possession of the avenues of trade and to exercise great influence over the economic and industrial interests of the country. It is a well-established fact that the Legislatures of the States granting the various charters of these corporations exercise the right of regulation as to their profits and as to the manner of their use, and it is further a well-established fact that the Legislatures of the different States may, by their acts, annul all the charters and so confiscate the money that has been invested in these corporations.

It is further conceded that the Congress of the United States under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution has the right to put its hand upon every common carrier in this country and to declare to what extent its profits shall reach and to what extent they shall not go. Congress can require of these railroads that they carry freight according to the provisions which it may make for the public weal, and thus may absolutely control the amount of their income. For some years the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], acting for the public good, has efficiently and patriotically sought to curb and control in this respect corporations engaged in the business of transportation.

Now, if it be true that the Congress of the United States can put its hand upon the common carriers, can curb them in their charges, can regulate their freight and passenger tariffs, is it not also true that the same power which thus puts pains and penalties upon these corporations has the right to protect them from hostile organizations which may compel non-user of their franchises, and by reason of non-user the forfeiture of their charters? To my mind there can be nothing clearer than the right of the American Congress, when it undertakes to legislate upon this subject at all, to legislate to protect as well as regulate.

Mr. REAGAN. Can Congress, by virtue of its constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce, provide a tribunal that shall settle disputes between common carriers or the agents of common carriers and their grocers and merchants?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. No, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. Then can Congress do so with reference to the employment of their laborers?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir. Now this bill seeks to establish a board of arbitration. With respect to that matter I think the gentleman from Texas is correct. But when the Congress of the United States, by virtue of its power over interstate commerce, exercises the right to establish a commission for the purpose of regulating freight and passenger tariffs, such a commission, by virtue of the same power that can regulate tariffs of transportation charges, can regulate the amount of per diem that may be demanded and required. That can not be done in the form of an arbitration. Whatever legislation there may be upon this subject ought to be attached to an interstate-commerce bill. The same power that lays its hand upon these corporations to regulate them for one purpose ought to do it for other purposes.

Mr. BLAND. Do I understand the gentleman to say that a commission appointed by authority of Congress can regulate the per diem of labor?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will answer the gentleman. It is claimed and conceded that under the power to regulate interstate commerce we can fix a maximum and a minimum price that shall be charged for transportation. Why fix a minimum? The object is to protect the corporations from competition among themselves which might be injurious to the public good; so that these corporations shall not destroy themselves and sacrifice the interests of the public by selfish and unholy contests. Now, if you can do that, why can you not go farther and say that these corporations, which for the public good you require to hold themselves in readiness to carry passengers and freight under certain regulations, shall not be destroyed by unjust and hostile organizations?

You can not accomplish that by arbitration. Arbitration means a settlement of something over which a court of law would have jurisdiction. Arbitration when first established under the Justinian code had reference only to those subjects of which a court could take cognizance. Never until recently, when the great growth of industrial interests has induced a change in this respect, was any other question ever submitted to arbitration. Lately there have been two other subjects submitted to arbitration—one, the price of labor; the other, the hours of labor. The political or legislative history of the country shows no instance in which any other subjects of which a court of justice had not cognizance have ever been submitted to arbitration.

But the bills now under consideration present this remarkable feature: that they positively prohibit arbitration upon those subjects alone about which there is controversy between capital and labor. The proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER], which he gives notice he will press as a substitute, provides expressly that arbitration shall have nothing to do with the wages of labor or the hours of labor. If arbitration be thus restricted what is the use of any bill at all? What controversy is there between capital and labor which does not relate to these two questions? Capital does not undertake to say what men shall or shall not buy; it does not undertake to prescribe the kind of houses in which people shall live, the kind of clothes they shall wear, the food they shall eat, or the drink they shall use. The whole question in controversy between capital and labor relates either to the wages of labor or the hours of labor. Yet these bills which the Congress of the United States, in what is recognized as an hour of universal trouble in this country, is asked to pass not only studiously avoid but positively prohibit any sensible or practical action upon these subjects.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the O'Neill bill include that?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The O'Neill bill includes nothing.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the gentleman will find it does if he reads it.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I am speaking especially of the bill of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER], which does undertake to include something.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Allow me to ask whether the Glover bill was considered by the Committee on Labor?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I do not know anything about what was considered by the Committee on Labor.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman know whether that bill was before the committee or not?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I know that the Glover bill by notice and by courtesy is before this House; and I am addressing myself to everything upon which the House may be called to vote.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then the gentleman can not answer those questions?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I know nothing about that matter.

Now I say, if this question is worthy of legislation, why should we not take hold of it like intelligent men and handle it as the interests of the parties involved demand? For myself, I am ready to declare that I am not only in full sympathy with every man who is struggling honestly to earn a livelihood, but I am in full sympathy with those who invest their capital for the development of the resources of this country, and thus give employment to thousands of people and create thousands of happy homes all over the country. Believing that both of these great interests ought to be subserved and protected, I am in favor of that kind of legislation which will accomplish something, and I am opposed to any other kind of legislation. Why do we want arbitration? Why do we want national legislation on this subject? Is it true that questions of supply and demand will not regulate themselves? Is it true that labor is weak and unable to compete against the power of money? Is it true that the money-power has acquired a hold upon the legislation of this country which it requires the masses of the people by their votes at the ballot-box to break? If it be true, then we must step in and legislate.

But while we undertake to legislate for the laboring people engaged upon these roads, we must remember that out of the twenty-one million of the laboring people of this country but a comparatively small number will be reached by the legislation now proposed. And every solitary class of people who are recognized as laborers, whether they are upon the farm, in private corporations, in private or public, or quasi political institutions, are interested in this matter. If legislation is needed, if arbitration is necessary to put down these strikes, to prevent these strikes, if arbitration is necessary to carry on the business of the country, it should be done with that sort of wisdom with which other laws are enacted.

For that reason, sir, I would ingraft upon an interstate-commerce bill a compulsory provision, requiring the commissioners appointed under that interstate-commerce bill by the President of the United States as the representative of this Government to take hold of all controversies arising between capital and labor, arising in public institutions and corporations, and settle them, not purely for labor alone, not purely in the interest of capital alone, but in the interest of the public and in behalf of the country.

Now, a great many things might be said why some sort of legislation is necessary between these people. It is well understood that these political corporations expect certain dividends. They put in a certain amount of money, and labor then comes in, and between the two there is expected to be some sort of division of profits. Let us see how the thing operates.

One of the principal parties to this great controversy which threatens to convulse the land—I refer to Jay Gould, upon whose Missouri Pacific Railroad these troubles culminated—purchased that road for $3,000,000. But he had no sooner purchased that road for $3,000,000 than he watered its stock to $30,000,000, and then demanded what cost him only $3,000,000 should pay dividends on $30,000,000 of watered stock. He added nothing to its freights or passengers; the road stood just as it was, while his watered stock, which goes out of the country, must be remunerated and pay a dividend. While the wages of officials were not cut down, they were required to be made up out of the labor that was on that road. The wages of the labor which operated it from time to time were cut down; men must work either for what they could get along the line of the road or they must wander from their homes and become tramps; they must, as an alternative, become separated from their families.

When interstate commerce takes hold of that road and undertakes to regulate not only the passengers but the freight which goes over it, have they not a right, having granted it the right of eminent domain, having given it the power to take hold of the people's property and condemn it to its use for the benefit of the public, having said you shall not charge the public more than a certain price, to demand of you that you shall not use this public to grind down your laborers or the freighters over your line?

Take the other great trouble we had in this country a year or two ago. Take the Hocking Valley road, where that great strike occurred which ended in the misery of thousands of people and the destruction of numberless homes; not only that, but also the scene of bloodshed and death along its line. There was again a case where a road was bought for $4,000,000 and its stock was watered to $20,000,000. It was then demanded of the men who delved in the mines along that road, out of the profits of that road, out of their labor, from the sweat of their face, should pay dividends not on the $4,000,000 paid for the road but on the $16,000,000 added to the $4,000,000—on the $20,000,000 to which that stock had been watered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here are two flagrant abuses of a great public right granted by the people to individuals for the public good, in which that public use has been used for the purpose of plundering the people along the lines of these roads, making those who did so robbers to such extent as never sailed the sea or roved the land in any country. [Applause.]

The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], in his strong and sensible speech on this subject, made reference to a printers' union, in which he said the printers could regulate themselves. That is true in private business; that is true with the ordinary concerns of life, but that is not true in reference to any corporation exercising political power; that is not true of any corporation which holds a part of the sovereignty of the land, and ought not to be true. When the country grants a part of its sovereignty to individuals it grants that sovereignty for a sovereign purpose and none other.

As I have already said, Mr. Chairman, this is not purely a question of labor. That is only one side of it. It is not a question of pay for employés, that is but one side of it.

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, most heartily in favor, of any legislation within the Constitution of the United States by this Congress, or any legislation by the States within the great constitutional rights of the States, which grants to the laborers of this country, to the employés of the different corporations a fair and an honest division of the profits made by the exercise of sovereign power. At the same time I recognize the fact that the public owes a debt to thousands of others. We have seen too much of this legislation for one class as against the other. We have seen legislation here upon our pension bill which has run up the expenditures of this Government to an advance of 20 per cent. upon all of its expenditures, simply for one class of people. We have seen it in various other things, first one provision and then another enacted here in order that some particular class might be benefited, never thinking apparently for a moment that every solitary privilege granted to them was just that much taken away from the many, and that when we build up two or three, to that extent we cut down the thousands of others, honest, hard-working people, throughout this broad land, who toil in organized masses to benefit themselves. The public, I say, therefore, have some rights under this legislation, and capital has some rights also. Both must be considered.

It is not to be said in this day that capital has no rights, when we have the benefits of organized capital, when it is honestly and fairly established. It is not to be said when we remember that within one short span of human life railroads have girdled this continent from ocean to ocean, and have carried thousands upon thousands of immigrants and thousands of our native people as well from our overcrowded cities of the East to seek homes on the broad, unoccupied prairies of this country, giving to them the opportunity there to build up homes, to rear their families, as well as to create great States, to add to the honor and the power and the dignity of this Government. It is not to be forgotten, sir, that within this short time, by virtue of these increased facilities for the transportation of products, we have seen factories spring up along every mountain side and in every valley, where the natural wealth of our country has been dug from the soil, shaped, manufactured into articles of skill and usefulness, every solitary one of which, marked by the ring of the hammer, indicated so many dollars or so many cents toward the care, provision, and support of so many others, and toward the building up of the country.

We should not by any hasty or ill-advised legislation put a stumbling-block in the way of this further development. We should not listen to the cry of the demagogue, or the man who seeks to acquire a seat on this floor by appealing to the passions, the prejudices, the wants, or the poverty of the people on the one side, nor should we listen to him who may stand here as the paid attorney of some corporation or the interested party in the corporation itself as against the laboring people. It should be remembered that capital will not invest itself for the development of the country if we leave these questions unsettled and permit combinations to compel non-user and forfeiture.

Why, only the other day in these late troubles the governors of two of the States, by solemn proclamation, required these railroad companies to put their trains in motion or suffer the penalties attached to a failure by the law; and if they failed to put their trains in motion upon these roads, which were blockaded by the strikes, suits were to be instituted for the forfeiture of their charters, and the millions of dollars invested were to be wiped out; while at the same time these men, anxious to move their own trains, suffering heavy losses by the delay forced upon them, were prevented by a combination of men not only refusing to work themselves but refusing absolutely to allow other men to work who desired to do so along the lines.

Now do not these various phases of the question present themselves to this House? Do they not become matters of serious moment and consideration? Ought we not here, as Representatives of a great nation—because no man can hold his seat upon this floor simply as a Representative of a party or of a district, but when he comes here he comes clothed with power to legislate for the sixty millions of people of this country, and not only clothed with that power, but he comes weighted with the solemn duty of legislating for their interest—I say ought we not as Representatives of this great nation to give this subject a more thorough and careful consideration than is proposed here? This bill has been hastily put upon us. There has been no chance for a consideration of it. There has been no opportunity for studying its merits or grave defects, or of considering, in the light of the relief afforded, this the greatest problem that the American Congress has ever had to deal with. There is no necessity for forcing it through the House to-day. The troubles of the last ten years have finally adjusted themselves; and the papers to-day bring the intelligence that the present trouble has been settled by an agreement entered into by the parties in interest to arbitrate their difficulties. A question involving so great a problem as this requires time. Why this panic which seems to have taken possession of the House? Is it because railroad attorneys are seeking to gain some advantage for their roads, or because some men perchance may be seeking to acquire popularity with the masses of the people?

Understand, Mr. Chairman, I do not apply these remarks to any member of this House. Men in this House may be influenced by those outside of it who are making these representations, but I believe that every member is acting from the same honest impulses and the same honest motives that I claim to be acting from myself. But this bill now before us, or its proposed substitutes, neither of them should pass this House to-day, nor ought it to pass any other day for many days to come. These measures should all be recommitted back to that committee, so that they may have time to recover from their panic, so that they might have time to consider this question as it ought to be considered, so that the country could think over it, and so that out of the aggregated wisdom there might be evolved some bill that would correct the evils complained of and bring about the happy condition we seek to establish.

Just here I may say, and I give notice now, that at the proper time I shall make a motion to recommit this bill with all the proposed amendments to the Committee on Labor, not with any instructions, because I believe that that committee is thoroughly impressed with the importance of this subject. I believe that with the discussion that has already been had in this House, and with the temporary settlement of the difficulties they were seeking to settle, honestly and patriotically seeking to settle, they will feel they have time to consider this bill and the others, to digest them as they should be digested, and to prepare a comprehensive bill and bring it to this House. And certainly this is a subject worthy of thought.

For ten long years, as I have said, there has been constant strife all over this country. To-day nearly all the skilled labor of America—this land that boasts that every man within it is a sovereign, an uncrowned king, this land that boasts that every man is the equal of his fellowmen—to-day, I say, nearly all the skilled labor has found it necessary that they should band together in an unarmed army for protection, meeting at night, meeting in secret, with passwords, with officers, with constitutions and by-laws, to fight their battles as they believe they are required to do against organized capital on the other side. And on the other hand we find organized capital, with its paid attorneys in every Legislative Assembly that meets in this land, whether it be National or whether it be State—we find its paid attorneys passing through the legislative halls and leaving their slime on every act of legislation that is passed.

The history of all the old countries shows there must be some legislation on this subject. As population increases, as money gathers itself together, as labor becomes poverty-stricken and hungry, these difficulties have increased everywhere across the ocean. While we have been legislating here, a nation with a king, with a standing army, with all the power of a monarchy, has been convulsed from one end to the other. People have been shot down; outrages have been committed such as tongue fails to utter; millions of dollars of property have been destroyed. And now that peace is partially restored at the end of the bayonet, the hives of industry, that give employment to these people, the sources of comfort and the sources of support, have been to a great extent destroyed, and they must again rebuild that which has been crushed out by a want of fair treatment between one and the other. That this state of affairs is growing in this country no one can deny. It can not be denied that we are fast approaching that time when the Government should, if it has the constitutional power, undertake, as far as it can, to become the peacemaker between these people to see that those to whom it grants political rights, that those to whom it has delegated part of its sovereignty, shall not use that sovereignty for the oppression of the many or the oppression of the few.

It should not be left unsettled that any corporation exercising part of the sovereignty of this land should have it in its power to do injustice to a single individual. I know, Mr. Chairman, that this is somewhat advanced ground. I know that this is legislation that this country has never been called upon to consider before. But you must remember that legislation is not made simply for the purpose of legislating. It is a wise maxim that there should be no law made in any country that is not demanded by public exigency or not required to meet some probable event. It has been the theory of this country, and in that it has been wiser than any other country under the sun, that as little legislation as possible should be had. Heretofore we have never had to confront these things; heretofore we have never had so many corporations fighting against each other; heretofore we have never had in the shape of railroad magnates so many public plunderers who raise their flag of piracy boldly before the country and defy it; heretofore we have never had so many millions of people who were required to live day by day by their labor. For twenty years thousands and thousands, running up into millions, of immigrants have come to this land. As a rule they have come here poor. It is necessary for them to make their living by work. They have crowded in upon those who were reared in this country. Labor elbows labor in all the sections of this country—not only in its centers, but all over the country. Not only does labor elbow labor, but capital elbows capital, and the fight goes on which syndicate can get possession of a part of the sovereignty of the country.

These conditions have brought upon us such a state of affairs as we have never had before. They make it necessary we should legislate upon this subject, and I for one care not what the result may be upon my political future. I only know that I have a duty here to perform, not only for myself and the people I now represent, but I have a duty to perform to my country as a patriot and to those who are to come after me. I am willing to exercise that duty here now. I am willing to take up the burden of this legislation. I am willing to go into legislation and enact such provisions as will make it impossible on the one hand for the greed of capital to choke up the commerce of this country and stop its great business from one end of it to the other, and which, on the other hand, will make it impossible for combinations of laborers or men acting unlawfully to accomplish the same objects.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the Committee on Labor I extend our sincere thanks to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] for the compliment which he has paid that committee by his expression of confidence in their patriotism and in their ability to handle the labor question; but we would more highly appreciate his action if, instead of indulging in complimentary allusions to the committee, he would cast his vote for the bill under consideration. This House agrees with the gentleman in his estimate of the Committee on Labor, for on last Monday it took from one of its most distinguished committees an important bill and sent it to our committee for consideration. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to speak upon this question, although, unlike my friend and colleague on the committee [Mr. BUCHANAN], I may lay claim to have had some humble and modest share in the preparation of this bill, which is a substitute for the original bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] who is the honored chairman of the Committee on Labor.

I repeat that it was not my intention to speak on this occasion but for the fact that I saw a deliberate attempt to stab the bill in the house of its friends. The distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], with that matchless eloquence, with those flights of fancy, with those powers of invective which have made his name a household word throughout this broad land, on yesterday attempted to annihilate the very soul of this bill. Believing it to be my duty as a member of the committee to defend the measure against an attack from one of its members, I shall endeavor to answer the objections raised by the gentleman from Virginia and by others who have spoken on the subject.

It is charged, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is unconstitutional. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] both directly and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] indirectly maintain that the bill is unconstitutional. It ill becomes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] to assail this bill on constitutional grounds, for if rumor speaks correctly, and if their intentions are to be discovered by an examination of the votes which they cast upon a question that was recently before this House, both of them intend to vote for that political educational monstrosity known as the Blair bill, which is the unholy offspring of an ill-assorted alliance between the bleak hills and chilly atmosphere of New Hampshire and the blue-grass fields and the sunny clime of Kentucky. [Laughter.] It ill becomes those gentlemen to complain of the unconstitutionality of this bill, when they are willing to vote for a measure which, without warrant or authority in the Constitution of the United States, appropriates $77,000,000 of the people's money and provides for their distribution among the States in proportion to the illiteracy of their inhabitants.

Those gentleman would doubtless claim that that measure is intended for the education of the slaves, when, in fact, not a person now living in the United States under twenty-one years of age was a slave, and not a single person who was born in slavery will ever directly receive any benefit from the passage of the bill. It ill becomes gentlemen to oppose this bill on the ground of its unconstitutionality, who purpose, as I understand, to vote for a bill that is clearly unconstitutional, and one of whose objects is to force the white children and the colored children to attend the same schools.

Mr. O'FERRALL. No, no.

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir; section 2 of the Blair bill provides that in each State and Territory and in the District of Columbia, in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money received in such State or Territory shall be apportioned and paid out, not in the proportion of illiteracy, but in the proportion that the white and colored children between the ages of ten and twenty-one years, both included, bear to each other, as shown by the census; and, further, that this provision shall not affect the application of the proper proportion of said money to the support of all common schools wherein white and colored children are taught together; so that if in separate schools there are one thousand white children and five thousand colored children the latter will receive five times as much money as the former; but where both classes are taught in the same schools the money is distributed per capita among them. Some so-called philanthropists believe that amalgamation is the true solution of the race problem—a result which might be produced by associating the white and colored children in the same schools.

It ill becomes gentlemen to oppose this bill on the ground of unconstitutionality, when they favor a bill which strikes at the school systems of the States and which aims a blow at the misty and obscure distinction that now exists between the rights of the States and the powers of the Federal Government; for if we once recognize Federal jurisdiction over the subject of education that jurisdiction will always be asserted and necessarily maintained because the people of the States will become accustomed to depend more and more upon Federal taxation for the support of the public schools, and the result will inevitably be the abandonment of the local common-school system and the establishment of a grand national educational scheme maintained by the United States Treasury, regulated by the United States Congress, and managed by United States officials.

As a slight evidence of the truth of these propositions I call attention to that section of the Blair bill which provides that the school-houses to be erected with the money which it appropriates can not be built except upon plans to be furnished from the capital of the nation, although it is likewise provided that the Government shall not pay over $150 for any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case.

The bill provides further that copies of the books used in the local schools shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Interior. For what purpose? In order to ascertain whether the children are taught in the Southern schools that slavery was a righteous institution; that the principles advocated by the South were correct, and that the late war was not a rebellion, but an attempt by the Southern people to preserve their rights as they understood them to exist.

How would the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who is a living monument of his own devotion to principle twenty-five years ago and of his gallantry on the gory field of battle, like to have the money denied to Virginia, to which she would be entitled under this bill, because his children were not taught that he had been an enemy of his country and a traitor? It is with bad grace, Mr. Chairman, that gentlemen oppose the bill under consideration who support such a measure as I have described, a measure which is grasped after because of the gilded bait that is extended in the distribution of the fund, but which, in fact, will make Virginia and Georgia and every other Southern State levy and raise more local taxes than their people have ever before paid for the maintenance of a system of public schools, because it provides that they shall receive each year from the General Government only an amount of the money equal to that which they had raised the preceding year by local taxation; and the amount to be raised by the States will increase each successive year until the maximum sum appropriated by the bill shall have been secured, while afterward the local taxes can hardly be reduced because the Federal support will be gradually taken away according to the provisions of the bill.

Section 1 provides that $7,000,000 shall be appropriated the first year, $10,000,000 the second year, $15,000,000 the third year, $13,000,000 the fourth year, $11,000,000 the fifth year, $9,000,000 the sixth year, $7,000,000 the seventh year, and $5,000,000 the eighth year.

Section 2 declares that the money shall be distributed in the proportion which the whole number of persons in each State being ten years of age and over, who can not write, bears to the whole number of persons in the United States.

But section 8 contains the following language:

> It is hereby provided that no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues or out of moneys raised under its authority in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

From an examination of these provisions it is apparent that in order to secure their share of the first year's appropriation Virginia and every other State will be compelled to show that during the preceding year they had expended an amount of money raised by State taxation equal to their respective shares of the Federal appropriation, and that this sum will constantly increase until the maximum is reached. If, therefore, under the provisions of the Blair bill on the basis of illiteracy, which is the ostensible basis for the distribution as well as the appropriation of the money, Virginia shall be found entitled to $500,000, before she can secure that amount she must, through her governor, establish the fact that during the preceding year there were expended in the State $500,000 which were raised by local taxation.

In addition to this the State will have to raise by local taxation each year more money than she receives from the Federal Government in order to entitle her to the next year's increased appropriation, until the maximum of $15,000,000 will have been reached, after which the Federal aid diminishes every year.

I repeat, therefore, that the effect of this bill, should it unfortunately pass this House, will be to increase local taxation in the Southern States, which are now groaning under as heavy tax burdens as they can bear for the education of their white and colored children.

My own State (Texas) makes no distinction, except in maintaining separate schools, between the whites and blacks in its educational system. It distributes the money in proportion to the scholastic population, and provides normal schools for the colored as well as the whites, and an agricultural and mechanical college for the colored children, while the time is not far distant when the colored youth of the State will have an opportunity to enter a State university just as the white children enjoy it now.

From another aspect the underlying principles of the bill ought to be condemned, for practically there is a glaring inequality apparent by a comparison of the respective sums raised by and donated to each State. Statistics show that some States which have expended millions of dollars in relieving themselves from the evils of illiteracy will by reason of that very fact receive but a small proportion of the fund appropriated, whereas their contribution will amount to millions of dollars during the time provided for in the bill.

Gentlemen say that the Federal Government ought not to provide for a tribunal of arbitration because this will be unconstitutional interference with the rights of the States; and yet they are alleged to be supporters of a measure which constitutes the governor of every State that accepts the bait a Federal superintendent of the public schools in his State, and makes him report to the Secretary of the Interior how much money has been raised by local taxation, how it has been expended, and whether it has been justly distributed among the people, or has been misapplied—a measure which requires the governor to report how much school money is in the treasury; whether any portion of his State has not been divided into school districts, and, if not, why not; the number of teachers employed; the relative number of white and colored children, and the average daily attendance of the scholars—a measure which not only makes the governor of a great Commonwealth a subordinate to the Secretary of the Interior, to whom he must report, but which also constitutes the Secretary of the Interior the supreme authority to hear complaints in regard to the distribution of the fund in the States, to determine whether all the conditions prescribed in the act have been complied with, and to actually withhold an annual appropriation from a State if the governor has failed to report to him, or if, in his opinion, the conditions, or any of them, have been violated.

The bill further declares that—

> It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to promptly investigate all complaints lodged with him of any misappropriation by or in any State or Territory of any moneys received by such State or Territory under the provisions of this act, or of any discrimination in the use of such moneys; and the said complaints, and all communications received concerning the same, and the evidence taken upon such investigations shall be preserved by the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be open to public inspection and annually reported to Congress.

Who are to be the parties to these investigations? Complaints are lodged with the Secretary of the Interior alleging that a sovereign State has misapplied or misappropriated "moneys received by such State under the provisions of this [the Blair] act," and as the Secretary of the Interior would certainly not enter a judgment on an ex parte hearing he causes the State to be made a party by notice to its governor to appear before him and defend the suit and show cause why said State should not, by the decree of a Federal official, be deprived of its Federal bounty!

What a spectacle! A great and independent State begs for money from the Federal Government to be applied in a certain manner and afterward appeals to the mercy of a Federal official or craves a judgment of not guilty upon a charge preferred against it of misappropriating the price of its degradation!

And yet the Blair bill will be supported by those who oppose the bill now under consideration because of its alleged unconstitutionality.

O tempora! O mores!

There is an unusual provision contained in the last section of the Blair bill, which reads that—

> The power to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

Why is this unusual provision placed in this bill? Is it an implied threat, or is it an inducement to members to vote for the bill? A succeeding Congress would have this power without any express reservation; but this provision is inserted in order that the people of the country may understand that unless the fund provided for in the bill is administered in accordance with the views entertained upon the educational question by the Federal authorities the annual supply will be cut off, and the States will be forced to depend upon their own resources for the education of their children.

But the gentleman from Virginia, in addition to the indirect charge of the unconstitutionality of this bill, urges with extreme good taste and with that personal courtesy which always characterizes his demeanor toward his fellow-members, that this bill, which came from the committee of which he is the most distinguished member, "will have about as much efficacy as a piece of court-plaster applied to a bald head to cure heart disease." I accept the compliment in the spirit in which it was tendered, and I have no doubt that when the gentleman, upon sober reflection, considers the language which he has used and the imputation which he has cast upon a committee with which he has been associated, and all the members of which esteem and honor him most highly, he will ask leave to expunge it from the RECORD.

He attacks this bill, but he proposes no remedy. I commend for his consideration the reply of the Grecian artist to a person who criticised his production: "It is easier to criticise than to imitate." He says that the principal objection which he has to it is that it establishes a new court, and that under the provisions of the Constitution no new judges can be appointed except by the President with the sanction of the Senate. I had always honored him from afar as a most distinguished constitutional lawyer; but I beg leave to call his attention to the fact that Congress has the power to establish "inferior tribunals" without any intervention of the President or of the Senate, by the passage of laws creating them, and that the tribunals of arbitration created by the operation of this bill, should it become a law, are not courts but mere commissions for investigation.

The gentleman objects to the bill, too, on the ground that these men will have extraordinary power. They will not have as much power as the mayor of a city or a justice of the peace in any State of this Union in regard to offenses committed against the United States; for I will tell the gentleman from Virginia—doubtless he knows it—that under an old statute of 1789, which will be found in the Revised Statutes today, mayors of cities and justices of the peace have the power to issue warrants upon proper complaint, arrest men, and try them as examining magistrates for violation of United States laws. Mayors of cities and justices of the peace! The very men upon whom he says this great country has to rely to prevent these strikes by their interposition. Just imagine a great, fat, round-bellied justice of the peace of the average dignity which characterizes those officers, marching down, with Parsons's Business Laws in one hand and Every Man His Own Lawyer in the other, and saying to ten thousand hungry men, "I tell you to disperse." What would they do? They would consign him to that place to which a gentleman from Iowa said he would like to go in order to come into more close contact with the confederates.

The gentleman says that there is legislation enough. I agree with him to a certain extent. There is legislation enough to put down domestic violence; because if the States are powerless, then, under the constitutional guarantee of a republican form of government to every State of the Union, the President, upon application of the governor in the recess of the State Legislature, may intervene. The State executive may call on the President to put down domestic violence when the Legislature can not be convened, and it is the duty of the President to comply with his request whenever the conditions exist which authorize the demand.

But the range of the vision of the gentleman from Virginia is too narrow. It is not the strikes, it is not the boycott, it is not the riot, which we propose to put down; but we propose by this bill to prevent the necessity for the existence of any such condition of things, if it be possible to adopt preventive legislation. I dislike to hear an expounder of the Constitution from a Democratic standpoint say that the proper remedy is the inauguration of a reign of terror in the United States by the invocation of the power which is in gunpowder and leaden bullets. That is not the remedy. We do not desire to see the streets of our cities turned into fields of battle between the people and the national guards. Our Army is intended for our protection against foreign enemies, and not for the destruction of our own people who combine for the assertion and maintenance of what they conceive to be their rights. Of course if property is wantonly destroyed or lives are unjustly taken the guilty ought to be punished, but bloodshed should be avoided as long as possible.

But the gentleman said that the mode of settlement suggested by this bill will cost the Government too much money. That is one of his objections. Mr. Chairman, if it had cost the United States Government $1,000,000 to prevent the late strike in the Southwest the country would have been greatly benefited, for the result of that strike was the paralyzation of trade; the avenues of commerce were obstructed; business was stagnant; thousands of men not connected with the Knights of Labor or with those who are having this contest with the railways, were thrown out of employment, because, in consequence of the strike, those who formerly employed them were unable to carry on their business. The cattle-men of my State have been injured, because they could not carry their cattle through to Saint Louis and Chicago. The business men of Saint Louis and of all parts of the country have lost millions of dollars. The traveling people of the United States have been the sufferers. In a word, the evil effects of the strike have been felt by all classes of society.

The evil which we have to remedy is not one in which the railroad corporations and their employés are alone interested; but it is an evil from which the mass of the people are the greatest sufferers. This is not a local question, as the gentleman from Virginia supposes it to be, between the railroad employés and the corporations alone. It is a question in which all the people of the United States are deeply concerned, and they desire by suggesting, through their representatives, peaceful remedies to the corporations and their employés to prevent if possible strikes in the future. And while it may cost the Government of the United States a million of dollars perhaps in the next five years for the contending parties to arbitrate, if the machinery proposed in this bill be put in motion the country will be the gainer, if thereby strikes are prevented.

There is no such thing as a tangible actual Government of the United States which can be affected by the expenditure of money; there are men who exercise functions under the Constitution and laws and carry on what is called Government; but they and the Government which they constitute are merely trustees for the benefit of the people, and when gentlemen say this bill will cost the Government too much they mean that it will cost all the tax-payers of the country; but it is better for the people to pay out a million of dollars in taxation to prevent a recurrence of these evils than to have the country in the condition in which it has been for the past few weeks, whereby there has been a loss in the aggregate of over $30,000,000, according to the best calculation.

But if the statement of the gentleman be true that this bill is powerless, that it is weak, that it will accomplish no good results, then it will not cost the Government a dollar. And in the prosecutions which are conducted under United States laws for criminal offenses who pays the expenses? It is the Government of the United States; and if in consequence of one of these strikes there should be bloodshed, and the offenders should be arraigned before the courts for trial, who then would pay the expenses? I venture to say that the expenses of a bloody conflict, such as would result perhaps if peaceful remedies were not adopted, and of a prosecution of the offenders, would largely exceed the amount required to conduct an investigation under the provisions of this bill.

But I pass from a further discussion of the speech of the gentleman who puts his ground of objection upon the fact that the operation of this bill, although it may prevent strikes, although it may save millions of money, costs too much, particularly when that gentleman is apparently willing that the tax-payers of the country should pay $77,000,000 ostensibly for the benefit of people who will not derive any advantage from the money. [Laughter and applause.]

Now my venerable and honored colleague from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has taken occasion to say this bill is unconstitutional.

But I had the pleasure of hearing one of the ablest men on the Judiciary Committee of this House, a gentleman on the other side, who is the acknowledged leader of that side of this House [Mr. REED, of Maine], defend this bill. And while he said it was not a panacea, he also declared that it was a suggestive remedy, perhaps crude, but that all incipient legislation on new subjects is necessarily crude. I heard the gentleman defend it, and he never would have defended it if in his opinion it had not been constitutional.

I was gratified to see that the leader of the Republican party in this House was an advocate of the measure introduced by the Committee on Labor. And I said to myself as I listened with pleasure to the words which fell from his lips, "Something good can come out of Nazareth." [Laughter.]

The very same objection which was raised to this bill yesterday by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] was urged to his bill by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE], whom I see before me, when that bill was up and Mr. REAGAN was making a speech on it—I mean Mr. REAGAN'S interstate-commerce bill. When the gentleman from Massachusetts suggested to him it was unconstitutional, he replied:

> The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] says if the Reagan bill is enacted into a law it will be more despotic than the Czar of all the Russias. I do not know how to characterize such an argument except to suppose that it springs from the exuberant fancy of the youthful and untrained statesman from Massachusetts. Certainly it could not be said by a grave, serious man with expectation that any one would believe it.
> And he gave us another specimen of his humor, Massachusetts Representative as he is, by warning us against the danger of consolidation and centralization found lurking in the Reagan bill. Doubtless the House, like myself, was a little surprised to find any Republican from Massachusetts an advocate of the doctrine of strict construction and State rights. He says there are fearful dangers in any attempt which may be made to protect the people against the discriminations, exactions, and injustices of railroad corporations, and finds an asylum for the repose, security, prosperity, and happiness of the people in the railroad pool, which erects one huge monopoly out of several small ones, denying to the people all competition in transportation and subjecting them without remedy to such demands as the railroads may make upon their property. He has no fear of the consolidation and centralization of the thousands of miles of railroads. His fears are awakened only by the effort to compel them to do justice by conservative, just, and wholesome legislation.

I now call attention to the fact that if, notwithstanding the objection raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Reagan interstate-commerce bill is constitutional, so then is this bill, for the regulation of commerce among the States is the fundamental object of both bills.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. CRAIN. I will; but as I am a new member I trust the gentleman will suggest the answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the Tehuantepec ship-canal is constitutional, is not this?

Mr. CRAIN. Undoubtedly it is, in my opinion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Has not that bill been reported favorably by a committee of this House?

Mr. CRAIN. Undoubtedly it has, and I thank the gentleman for the suggestion.

Mr. DUNN. Is authority to establish a judicial tribunal derived from the commercial power?

Mr. CRAIN. No; but it is derived from another article in the Constitution.

Mr. DUNN. Which is that?

Mr. CRAIN. That which provides Congress shall have power to establish inferior tribunals.

Mr. DUNN. For the purpose of regulating commerce?

Mr. BUCHANAN. If Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce——

Mr. CRAIN. One at a time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce, has it not the power to try to prevent the stoppage of commerce?

Mr. CRAIN. Undoubtedly; and that is the point I propose to make. The Supreme Court of the United States has said that under this general authority to regulate commerce Congress has the right to remove trammels from commerce. And under the word "commerce" is included not only intercourse, not only traffic, not only transportation, but labor. This is the language of the Supreme Court in one decision:

Commerce, in its amplest signification, means an exchange of goods, but in the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, care, and various mediums of exchange become commodities and enter into commerce; the subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations, become the object of commercial regulations.

I quote, Mr. Chairman, from the opinion of Chief-Justice Marshall in the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, I, 229.

Mr. REAGAN. Since my colleague has referred to my remarks, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DUNN. I would like to have the privilege of reading for the gentleman in this connection a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which expressly declares to the contrary of the position he holds.

Mr. CRAIN. I should be very glad to yield if I had the time. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. CRAIN. Then I have not time to finish my remarks, and must decline to be interrupted.

My colleague [Mr. REAGAN] in presenting his interstate commerce bill to the Committee on Commerce, several years ago, said:

I have never assumed and do not now assume that it will meet all the difficulties of the railroad problem, or that other legislation may not be found necessary in the future on this subject. Nor do I assume that this bill may not be improved by amendment.

So say I in regard to this bill; and so say the committee who have prepared it.

Gentlemen express dissatisfaction with the fruits of the committee, but they offer no substitute.

They attack the bill, point out what they are pleased to call its defects, denounce it in one breath as a "sham and a fraud," and in the next, announce their intention to vote for it—and right here I will say that I would give up my seat in Congress before I would deliberately vote for a measure which I considered a "sham, a fraud, and a trick"—but they propose no amendment to make the bill more effective.

The bill is ridiculed by some members of this House, and their ridicule shows that they know nothing about it. The truth is that a dynamite measure was expected from the Committee on Labor, and some gentlemen are disappointed because we have brought into the House such a calm, conservative bill, which is characterized by one gentleman as a "sucking dove."

But, to return to a consideration of the constitutional objections of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

In the argument made by him, to which I have already referred, Mr. REAGAN said:

The first question to be considered is the power of Congress to regulate commerce between or among the States.

And the gentleman argued in this connection that Congress can not regulate the corporate rights and franchises of the railroads in the States.

That is true where the charter is derived exclusively from the States, but there are exceptions arising from the procuration of charters from Congress. For instance, in the case of the Texas and Pacific Railroad it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that as that corporation was operating under a charter derived from Congress it was authorized under the statute to remove a suit to which it was a party from the State to the Federal court. I venture the opinion, therefore, that in every case in which the railrord corporation has obtained its charter from Congress that body has a right to regulate and control it.

And I further say that if Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce, as is claimed by my honored colleague; if it is authorized by the Constitution to regulate freights, which are contracts between the shipper and the common carrier, it certainly has the power to remove all trammels and obstructions that may hinder, impede, or interfere with the carrier in the performance of his contract, and may force him to put in motion the wheels that are to transport the freight which he has undertaken to deliver. If this be true, then Congress has jurisdiction of the subject matter of this bill, which is in the nature of a regulation of commerce.

But in connection with this proposition as to the constitutionality of the question I read now from the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Railroad Company vs. Richmond, reported in 19 Wallace, where the question was as to the effect of two certain acts of Congress, one authorizing railroad companies to receive compensation for certain property carried from one State to another to connect with other roads so as to form continuous lines, and one to maintain a bridge over the Mississippi River and to lay tracks over such bridge. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, says—and I call the attention of the gentleman from Texas particularly to the reading of this decision, because I say if you can regulate interstate commerce under his bill you can remove the obstructions from interstate commerce under another bill.

This is the language of Mr. Justice Field:

These acts were passed under the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, and were designed to remove trammels upon transportation between different States which had previously existed, and to prevent the creation of such trammels in future, and to facilitate railway transportation by authorizing the construction of bridges over the navigable waters of the Mississippi.

In the case of Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge Mr. Justice Miller said:

The power to regulate commerce is a power to regulate the instruments of commerce.

The gentleman from Texas said that Congress has no power to regulate the instruments of commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. I never said that.

Mr. CRAIN. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

In the case of Cooly vs. The Board of Wardens, 12 Howard, 316, the court says that—

The power to regulate navigation is the power to prescribe rules in conformity with which navigation must be carried on. It extends to the persons who conduct it as well as to the instruments used.

In commenting on this case Justice Miller says, in the case of Gray vs. The Clinton Bridge, above cited:

Navigation is here spoken of as one of the subjects of legislation included within the power to regulate commerce.

In this view of the subject Congress has passed statutes regulating steamboats, their construction, equipment, officers and crew, prescribing qualifications of the pilots and engineers, limiting the number of passengers they may carry, and laying down the signals they shall use in passing each other, and, in short, has prescribed a minute code for building and navigating those vessels. The right to do this depends wholly upon the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce, and has never been disputed.

Navigation, however, is only one of the elements of commerce. It is an element of commerce because it affords the means of transporting passengers and merchandise, the interchange of which is commerce itself. Any other mode of effecting this would be as much an element of commerce as navigation. When this transportation or interchange of commodities is carried on by land it is commerce as well as when carried on by water; and the power of Congress to regulate it is as ample in one case as in the other. The commerce among States spoken of in the Constitution must, at the time that instrument was adopted, have been mainly of this character, for the steamboat which has created our great internal commerce on the rivers was then unknown.

From this decision it would appear that Congress has the power to regulate "the persons who conduct commerce as well as the instruments used," whether the commerce be carried on in steamboats by water or on railways by land.

And by whom are railways conducted? By their officers, agents, and employés; by their presidents, superintendents, local and other agents, conductors, engineers, firemen, brakemen, and the laboring men who lay the track and keep it in order. The Supreme Court says:

The power to regulate commerce extends to the persons who conduct it as well as to the instruments used.

From a consideration of these and numerous other cases on the subject of the regulation of commerce between the States it would seem that the Reagan bill, so called, is not obnoxious to the charge of being unconstitutional, but I must confess that I do not see any distinction between that bill and the one now before this committee. They refer to the same subject-matter, namely, the regulation of commerce between the States, for while one regulates freights, prevents pooling and discriminations—in other words, provides how commerce shall be regulated—the other provides the mode for keeping it moving.

One bill prescribes regulations for the contracts made by the shipper and the carrier in relation to the freight, while the other bill seeks to put the wheels in motion and actually deliver the freight at its point of destination. If Congress has the power to authorize qui tam actions and the institution of criminal prosecutions for violations of the provisions of the Reagan bill it certainly has the power to pass this bill.

But I pass now to a consideration of the merits of the bill before us.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], who is also a member of this very important Committee on Labor, which not only grapples with the great economic problem that is now agitating the people of this country but which has also the power to consider the important question of education, suggests an amendment. He says he proposes to force one side into arbitration.

The word arbitration, whether you take its meaning from Webster or consider its technical signification, means a voluntary agreement to submit disputes to one or more disinterested persons. And whenever you attempt to drag either party into the discussion without his consent, whether it be the corporation or the laboring man, you destroy the very idea of arbitration. It is no longer arbitration, but is compulsory in its very essence, for without the forms of law or processes of courts of justice you propose to make a man answer against his will and be represented by another whom he has not authorized by power of attorney or legal appointment to represent him. I am opposed to that. And if, as the gentleman says, this bill is as mild as drinking a glass of water because it can not be enforced, I ask, will it be better enforced by adding that amendment? Not in the slightest degree.

Force is exactly what we desired to avoid putting in motion when we prepared this bill, its underlying principle being voluntary arbitration as opposed to compulsory arbitration, so called; for the very essence of arbitration is that it shall be voluntary. I shall, therefore, oppose the amendment offered by the gentlemen from Ohio.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose to briefly analyze the provisions of this bill and ascertain whether it be as "mild as a glass of water," as harmless as a "piece of court-plaster," or whether it be a "sham, a fraud, and a wicked trick."

I am no demagogue; I do not seek to acquire votes by espousing the cause of the Knights of Labor, or by advocating the claims of the railway corporations; but I do believe that the rights of property and the rights of labor should be equally respected and protected. I do not uphold the wanton destruction of property, and I am opposed to the shooting of men in cold blood in the streets of Saint Louis, or in any other place, because, forsooth, without violation of law or breach of contract they deem proper to refuse to labor.

It was to prevent collisions and bloodshed that the committee formulated this bill. We thought that one of its effects would be to bring the capitalist and the laborer nearer together, to draw them into closer relations, the result of which might be to convince each that his opinion of the other was erroneous, and that the happiness and prosperity of both would be best secured by an acknowledgment and recognition of their common rights and reciprocal duties.

Capital and labor are correlative terms, and the capitalist and laborer are mutually dependent. Without capital to employ him the laborer would soon starve; and without labor to put his capital in motion the capitalist would be equally helpless. Placed alone with all his wealth upon a barren island in the middle of the ocean Mr. Gould would be as helpless as the poorest laborer in his employment under similar conditions.

The committee therefore believed that in arbitration might be found a means of enabling both sides to come into closer contact and to learn their reciprocal rights and duties; and to provide for arbitration it was deemed necessary to declare in the bill that each arbitrator should be impartial and disinterested in the actual subject-matter in controversy, and that both of them should select a third with similar qualifications. In this connection, it may be said that one of the principal difficulties heretofore encountered in the endeavor to arbitrate has arisen in the choice of arbitrators. Each party would select an arbitrator who regarded the question from the standpoint of the side that selected him, while in general those chosen failed to select a third. This difficulty is removed by the feature of the bill just suggested.

The enemies of this bill contend that the corporations and their employés now have a right to arbitrate, and that the bill gives no additional remedy. True, they have that right, and have endeavored to exercise it, but the results have been fruitless. Two opponents of this bill have declared on this floor that the cause of the great strike now going on was a dispute about the terms and conditions of the agreement that was the result of the last arbitration, and even Messrs. Gould and Powderly disagreed in respect to the construction to be placed upon their language in their recent interview. The case is one-sided where there is a disagreement about the terms of an award between a poor, friendless laborer and a wealthy, powerful corporation.

To prevent these disagreements, misconstructions, and misinterpretations of their awards, this bill provides that both parties shall have the right to be present in person and by counsel upon the trial of the issues joined and to produce their witnesses, and that the arbitrators shall make a public declaration of their award, which shall afterward be promulgated by the Commissioner of Labor. This award is not the report of the representative of one side or the other, which may be called in question within twenty-four hours, but it is an authoritative declaration by a disinterested tribunal charged with the determination of the question, and can not be the subject of dispute or misrepresentation, because it is made officially and is proclaimed to the world by the Commissioner of Labor; and thus one cause of disputes is removed.

Another feature of this bill is that it directs the preservation of the testimony taken in each case in the office of the Commissioner of Labor, which might operate as a check upon the arbitrators, but which would be principally valuable in the preparation of the annual reports of the Commissioner of Labor and for the consideration of Congress and of the Legislatures of the various States in dealing with the great labor question. This testimony would be infinitely more valuable than any amount of theoretical disquisitions delivered before a traveling committee of Congress, because it would be actual, practical, tangible evidence, germane to real, live issues joined by and between parties in interest, and would not be wild, visionary theories upon the general condition of labor throughout the country.

But it is urged that if either party objects there will be no arbitration. This is true; but I venture the assertion that neither party would place itself before the public in the attitude of declining an offer of arbitration under this bill, for that would be an admission of wrong and of a fear to face an investigation.

My colleague [Mr. REAGAN] objects to the bill for another reason, namely, that parties would be taken away from their homes to these Federal tribunals and that their personal expenses would be very heavy, and he compares these tribunals of arbitration in these respects to the Federal district and circuit courts. Had the gentleman read the bill with his usual care he would have discovered that it requires the board of arbitration to hold its sittings at the nearest practical point to the place of the origin of the difficulty, and that the expenses of the parties are to be paid by the United States Government. If the poor laborer had to pay his share of the expenses of the arbitration, as the gentleman from Virginia would have him do, there would be no investigations, because his poverty would deprive him of justice and would prevent him from seeking it.

Another objection urged to the bill is that it fails to provide a method for the enforcement of the award of the arbitrators. I will ask the constitutional lawyers who oppose this measure whether they can frame a bill for the settlement of these labor troubles by arbitration which will provide the means for the enforcement of the award. How can the railroad corporation be compelled to a specific performance of a contract for labor? And how can you compel a laborer to work for a corporation if he refuses so to do? Suits for damages for breach of contract might lie, but a specific performance could not be enforced.

Would you say to the laborer, "You must work for the railway company at $2 per week, for that is fair remuneration for your labor?" If you do that you put the laboring men of this country in the same condition from which over twenty years ago four millions of people were released at a cost of millions of treasure and oceans of blood. You certainly would not attempt to reduce the laboring men of this country to a condition which would be even worse than slavery, for you would require them to provide for themselves and their families and at the same time deprive them of the means of doing it.

On the other hand, how can you compel the corporations to employ men to whom they object?

The rights of both parties are identical. One party can not be forced to employ, while the other party can not be compelled to work. If, however, a voluntary arbitration is agreed upon in accordance with the provisions of this bill, and an award is made and publicly announced, public opinion will compel its observance by the parties.

Gentlemen well know that the sanction of all law is derived from public opinion, which has its influence upon every member of society. There are many laws upon the statute-books of the States of this Union which are not enforced simply because they are not indorsed by public sentiment and their enforcement is opposed by public opinion. There is a law against dueling in most if not all of the States, and yet in some of them it is not enforced. And why? Because public sentiment still recognizes that species of murder which not infrequently results from dueling, as a fair and legitimate settlement of private grievances.

No law can be enforced unless it be sustained by the power of public opinion, and no law can be violated with impunity if it be backed up by public sentiment. The pressure of public opinion frequently acquits men whom the law would adjudge guilty. The railroad corporations as well as the laboring men recognize the power of public opinion, as they show by their frequent appeals to that tribunal.

At Galveston a disagreement recently occurred between the Mallory steamship line and the Knights of Labor. Whereupon the agent of the line appealed to public opinion in a circular setting forth his statement of the case. Soon afterward the Knights presented their side of the case in a public communication. Each side realized the necessity of arousing public sentiment in its favor, and made a direct appeal to the tribunal of public opinion. Mr. Gould recognized the immense power of public opinion in his late controversy with his employés. As long as public sentiment was in his favor, as he thought, he was as immovable as a stone wall, but the moment he discerned the tide of public opinion setting aganist him he had the good sense to yield.

Public opinion, then, will be a powerful lever with which to enforce the awards of these arbitrations, and will also have a tendency at least to compel an issue to be joined whenever either party tenders it to the other. But whether this bill shall ever become a law or not, the discussion which it has evoked will have a salutary effect by showing the people of the country that Congress is determined to consider seriously the grave and momentous questions involved in the labor problem, and if possible discover a solution which, while recognizing and protecting the rights of labor and the rights of capital, will restore peace and quiet to the country and happiness and prosperity to all of its citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time (forty minutes) has expired. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] will be recognized for the remainder of the hour.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON].

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois give me a minute or two?

Mr. WORTHINGTON addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was reported yesterday it was not my purpose to occupy the attention of the House in the discussion of the measure, and it is only because of some criticisms upon the action of the committee that reported the bill, a committee of which I have the honor to be a member, that I am impelled to occupy a few moments this morning. We have been criticised because we have not presented a better bill than the one which is before the House, because we have not presented a bill that will cure all the ills to which labor and capital are heir. Why, Mr. Chairman, do these gentlemen who have thus criticised the Committee on Labor suppose that this committee possesses the jurisdiction and intelligence to deal with all these questions? First, I answer, we lack jurisdiction to go further than we have gone in this measure. The bill which has been presented has been criticised because it has been said it appeals to nothing. Sir, it appeals to the highest arbiter we have in this land; it appeals to public sentiment; it appeals to public judgment—that same public sentiment and that same public judgment which sent here the gentlemen occupying these seats around me; that same public sentiment and public judgment which may send somebody else here in the next Congress unless you do something to ameliorate the condition of labor.

You ask me how shall that be done? True, this measure is not broad enough to cover the whole question. You might as well attempt to cure a cancer by rubbing salve upon the surface and thus temporarily to allay the irritation, as to attempt to deal with the labor problem without going to the root of the disease. There are roots to this question. These roots are of many years' growth, and in my humble judgment are the outcome of legislation enacted in this Hall. Let me call your attention, gentlemen, to the extent of this question.

For years we have been pretending that we were protecting labor in some form or another under the laws of the United States. We have read it in party platforms and in the newspapers; we have heard it from the stump, and it has gone forth to the world. The world has accepted the invitation, and people have flocked here from abroad to mingle with our laboring classes until to-day there are a million idle men within the limits of the United States. Protect American labor under your tariff laws! Why, the only two things essential to human existence that flow across the national boundary lines free of duty are the air we breathe and the labor that performs our work. The workmen from foreign lands, invited here by this pretense of protection, have come across our boundary lines, across the docks at our customs offices, bidding good morning to the customs officers, have passed in free of duty and have mingled with our laboring population. Will the great Ways and Means Committee of this House suggest some remedy for this?

Let me call attention to another thing; and in the few minutes now allowed me I can not go into details on this question. We have been taught that the vast public lands of the United States were the inheritance of ourselves and our children. Within these legislative Halls you have legislated away to these giant monopolies that to-day have their hand upon the throat of labor millions of acres of the public domain, which ought to have been left as a safety-valve for American labor. Will the Public Lands Committee correct that? Nay, more, you have granted away or sold or permitted to be sold millions of acres of other public lands to syndicates of non-resident aliens, who to-day are building up a British landlord system upon the soil of America. Will the proper committee of this House assist the Labor Committee in correcting that evil?

Will the financial committees of this House, when they look over the country and see the stagnation of business, assist us in bringing into circulation the money that is hoarded in the vaults of the Federal Treasury or locked up in banks—will they assist us in putting that money into free circulation so that the wheels of industry may revolve? For, gentlemen, talk as you will about the abundance of money in the country, that money is of no good unless it is in circulation. Money in trade and business is like the life-blood that flows through our veins and furnishes our vital forces; once check its circulation, and you see stagnation and paralysis; let it flow freely through the veins, and there is health.

Mr. Chairman, these are evils that affect this labor problem. Nay, more, let the committee appropriately having charge of certain bills relative to the forfeiture of land grants which would enlarge our public domain bring in some measure which will forfeit every acre of land unjustly granted in cases where the terms and conditions of the grant have not been complied with. If you will do these things, gentlemen, and thus accept a little part of the criticism for yourselves, you will not be blaming the Labor Committee for not doing that which it has no jurisdiction to do.

Mr. Chairman, one word more and I am done. Objection is made to this measure by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] on the ground that it is unconstitutional, inasmuch as it assumes to create a new court not provided for by the Constitution. I am not a constitutional lawyer, but it strikes me the board proposed to be created by this bill is not a court, but is simply an agency of this House, an agency of the representatives of the people, to be sent into particular localities for the purpose of obtaining information and bringing it back here to be filed among the public records, where we can see it and ascertain the cause of these troubles. It strikes me, I say, that this is not a court, not a judicial tribunal, but simply an agency created by Congress for the purpose of gathering information. It is likewise an agency that would bring to bear upon the party who refuses to arbitrate the condemnation of the people of this country.

Let me illustrate for a moment. Suppose you have a situation as you find it to-day; suppose the employés of these great roads in the West should say to the manager of those roads, "Well, Mr. Gould, we propose to arbitrate with you; we will frame an honest board of arbitration and invite you to come before it and submit your grievances and we will submit ours and abide by the result," would not the seal of condemnation of public opinion be stamped on Mr. Gould or be stamped upon the labor organizations should either decline to submit to the award of such a tribunal?

Then, Mr. Chairman, unless we can get a remedy for some of these great evils which, like a cancer, have grown in the body-politic, we must look forward to a dark and dreary future, I fear, over this great Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, on the 22d of March, when railroad traffic was entirely suspended in the State I have the honor in part to represent, as well as in four other States, I introduced a bill to create a national commission to arbitrate differences between railway corporations and their employés. Realizing that the Committee on Labor, to whom it was referred, was not a privileged committee, and consequently that any bill it might report would go upon the Calendar and probably not be reached during the session, I exercised the right possessed by every gentleman on the floor to ask unanimous consent that this committee might have power to report for consideration at any time such legislation on the subject as it chose to present. No gentleman on the Democratic side of the House had seen fit to make such a request, and therefore upon this side I saw fit so to do, representing the interests of my constituents and exercising my unquestioned right, and it is under that order of the House that the subject is now before us.

I wish to return my thanks to the Committee on Labor for their kindness and courtesy in hearing me on two occasions with respect to the bill indicated. It was the first, and at the time of introduction the only one on the subject, so far as I then knew. And in any criticism I may make of the bill which the Committee on Labor has reported, realizing fully the difficulty and gravity of the subject I wish it understood that I have no censure to pass upon any member of that committee.

It seems to me that on a question so broad as this, while it is natural that the debate should embrace the many subjects which have been discussed, yet it is wise to eliminate from it all issues except the one now before the House. It has been correctly said that the labor question—one which has run through all the ages, and the difficulties of which spring from the innate qualities of men—can not be settled by law. That, sir, is correct. But I submit that the labor question, in its large and true sense, is not the issue before us. That is a question which is as universal as the vocations of men. Wherever there is any one at work there you will have the labor question. It is as multiform as the pursuits and toil of men. We have presented to us to-day a very small portion of it, only one of its incidents, a mere outcropping of the great underlying stratum; and it will be well for us, I fancy, to recognize this fact and to ascertain just what is the precise issue. I wish that the labor question in all its magnitude and details were presented for action, but it is not.

THE ISSUE.

The exact and only issue now before us is simply this: Shall Congress enact legislation designed to compel common carriers of any interstate commerce to perform their obligations as such; and, if so, what should be the scope, nature, and force of this legislation? This is a very different proposition from the one whether two parties may have a voluntary arbitration, and rests on a different foundation. Because of this fact, many of the opinions and objections which have been urged on the floor against the latter are illogical as to the former. Nor is the action of railway employés who choose to stop working, or their reasons for so doing, the main question. In so far as the "striking" of workmen is concerned, in so far as any action of the Knights of Labor or the Brotherhood of Engineers, or of all other men, may be concerned, the whole of that is a mere incident. The real, the sole question, and the one which I propose to discuss, is whether Congress should enact legislation to compel common carriers of interstate commerce to perform their obligations as common carriers; and, if so, what should be the scope, nature, and force of such legislation?

Now, that raises some other questions which are primarily to be discussed. There are limitations imposed upon Congressional action. These limitations arise from two distinct sources: first, the limitations imposed by the recognized and just rights of common carriers; and second, the limitations imposed by the Constitution on the exact power of Congress to deal with such questions. Coming to the first point, what are the limitations imposed by the rights of common carriers?

And as I am speaking extemporaneously, legal gentlemen will kindly excuse any failure of one who is not a lawyer to express distinctions of ideas by the technical terms of their profession.

RIGHTS OF EMPLOYER AND EMPLOYÉ.

Before entering upon that let us ascertain what are the general and recognized rights of the employer and employé in the private industries of life. There is first the right of the employer to engage in a business and conduct it according to the laws of the land, and to terminate it whenever he pleases. There is the further right upon his part to say whom he will employ, how long he will continue any one in his service, when, where, and how that employé shall work. Upon the part of the employé is the right to take or the right to reject employment; to accept certain wages or to decline the wages offered. But he is under the obligation to discharge those duties which the employer imposes upon him, and which he has agreed to perform, as to the time and the manner of his work. I am speaking now of the general rights of all employers and of all employés. It is certainly clear that on this general basis, if there be no other limitations, a railway company may exercise precisely the same rights as to its employé; that is to say, it may determine whom it will employ, what compensation it will pay, what work that employé shall do, when he shall do it, how he shall do it, where he shall do it, and it may discharge him when it pleases. On the other hand is the right of the employé to take work from the company under this recognition of the conditions, to accept the wages they offer; furthermore, his unquestioned right to reject these wages and his unquestioned right to quit in a flash if he pleases. There can be no doubt as to these general rights.

OBLIGATIONS OF A RAILWAY COMPANY AS A COMMON CARRIER.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a broad and significant distinction between the obligations of the railroad company as a common carrier and employer, and the obligation of an employer engaged in a private enterprise. Take a manufacturer of cigars, for instance. He may continue his business or he may terminate it at will; but can a railroad company as a common carrier lawfully refuse to discharge its obligations as such? Not at all. There is no obligation either in fact, nor is there any obligation which under any law can be imposed upon a citizen of the United States requiring him to engage in and continue any private industry. He is free to do so or not to do so as he sees fit. But there is an obligation on the railroad company holding the exclusive franchise to use a railroad, and operating that road as a common carrier, to discharge its advertised duties; to run the trains at the hour named, to run them to the places named, to be ready to carry for all who may apply, to accept and to deliver freight in accordance with its advertised schedule. These are obligations which are imposed by the very nature of the work of a common carrier, and by the relation which this service holds to the public, for they are functions of which he can not divest himself. More than that, they are obligations that he must either discharge or else quit the business, one or the other. No railroad company can legally say that it will not run its trains. Under the very conditions of its charter, under the common-law obligations of common carriers, the public has such an interest in the business as to compel him to discharge these functions.

And this now makes a very great difference between the relations which a railroad company as an employer may hold to its employés, and the relations which a private manufacturer does hold to his employés. As to the private manufacturer, neither Congress nor the State can do anything toward compelling him to continue his business; but as to the common carrier, Congress can go to the extremest lengths in compelling him to perform full and legal service, or, failing in that, to surrender the franchise of operating a railroad. And the exercise of this power might, under some circumstances, justly prevent a railway company from discharging its employés until others were ready to perform their service.

COMBINATION OF RAILWAY EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. Chairman, we have reached an era in the world's movement new in history. Owing to the dissemination of knowledge through the press and by the telegraph, owing to the development of science in all of its forms and directions, there has come to be such a growth of the masses, such a development of individual intelligence, such an increased personality and manhood, that to-day and as a nation we have fully entered that new era when combinations on the one side not only suggest but force combinations upon the other.

For years we have had, and we have seen them in this Hall, the combinations of aggregated capital. We have had the poolings of railways; we have had the combinations of manufacturing, of importing, of banking, and of railway interests; we have had capital in its aggregated form, no matter what might be its specific shape, we have had it in all forms standing shoulder to shoulder in this Hall and abroad all through the land. And what is the result? You now have on the other hand precisely the same development. You have the combination of the employés of these railways so to protect themselves against the greed and avarice of the corporations that they may secure fair pay for faithful work. You have the combination of farmers all over the continent seeking to protect themselves and to retain in their own pockets some of that profit of which railways rob them by raising freights; you have the combinations of mechanics, miners, and laborers. And to-day—not to such an extent perhaps as will be true next year, and certainly not to such an extent as will be true within ten years—but yet to-day the spirit of mutual interest and sympathy is uniting these various combinations of all workmen, and this great movement is so powerful and taking such direction, that it is clear to any man who will look into the future that the question which Congress will have to meet, sooner or later, is the question of protecting the rights of the people, and of regulating the railway and other corporations in the great struggle between combined labor and combined capital. That is the great problem of the future, the burning intense issue of the hour, as well as the crucial test of American statesmanship.

COMBINATION OF WORKMEN LAWFUL.

It is said that when workmen combine they do an unlawful act. Suppose I believe in the divinity of Christ and in salvation by His grace, which I do, and that other gentlemen entertain the same belief; we combine, we form a church. It is a combination of men holding the same doctrines and desiring to effect the same purposes; is not that combination lawful? Suppose that men entertain the same political opinions, may they not combine in a party? A caucus is a combination. Is that caucus therefore unlawful? Or suppose that workmen choose to combine, is that combination per se unlawful? Suppose they do nothing unlawful, can it be said that their combination is a conspiracy or illegal? Men may combine, men do combine. God created them to combine. This Republic is the result of combination, and itself a combination. And to say that these men, risking their lives upon the engine, upon the car, whirling trains over the country in the dark, working for pittances in order that their wives and their children may have a roof, may have food and clothing—to say that the combination of these men is a conspiracy is simply to repeat the malignant slander of a railway lobby. There is no conspiracy about it. They have a perfect right to combine.

Now, suppose that such men refuse to work. They have a right to refuse to work. The employé has the innate right of every free man to work when and for whom he pleases, and to quit when he pleases. Suppose these men persuade other men not to work. They have a right so to persuade men. Why, I have often sought to persuade the Democratic party to do good and just things; had I not the right?

Mr. BUCHANAN. How did you succeed?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Not very well! But the right of persuasion is an inalienable and legal right. Suppose they should say to those other men, "We will pay you better wages to go elsewhere." Have they not the right so to do? Undoubtedly they have. But then, on the other hand, suppose they do an unlawful act; suppose they turn a switch or "kill" an engine, or ditch a train, is that right? No, it is a violation of law. Suppose they kill a man; is that right? No, it is murder.

The point I make is this: They have a right to combine so long as they recognize the lawful rights of other men and themselves do nothing unlawful; then and so long they are doing a just and wise thing. And if they be not, certainly the last men who should raise this objection are the representatives of the railroad interests. Combination! Look at the combinations of the railroads; look at the poolings and the other rascalities performed by them. I do not say by all of them, but look at the lands some of them have tried to steal. Look at their gross violation of the rights of the public, and then say whether when they combined and have done these things, they have not acted just as illegally as when the employés combined and did things which they ought not to have done. My only point is that in so far as the kettle is black the pot at least need not call it black.

While every wrong has a remedy, in experience the antithesis is usually correct, that every strong remedy has a wrong. There can be no stern struggle between great powers, there can be no great movements of masses of men in conflict, without some wrongs. But recognizing that, I am frank to say that in this great struggle, and not indorsing or in the least approving these wrongs, my sympathies are with the men in combination against the greed of corporations; and I believe that to be the general sentiment of the thoughtful people of the United States.

THE FAILURE BY A RAILWAY COMPANY TO SECURE WORKMEN IS NOT A LEGAL EXCUSE FOR STOPPING TRAINS.

But it is alleged that the combination of employés excuses a common carrier from the discharge of his duties as such. The only act or occurrence which can excuse a common carrier is an act of God, or of the public enemy. Certainly under this first exception there can be no just exemption. The action of these men is not the act of God; it is the act of man. Nor can the carrier be excused under the second proposition, because these men can not be regarded as a public enemy until they do some unlawful act. Up to that point the carrier is not excused by their action. So that in fact, under the Constitution and laws of this nation, Congress has the right, as to interstate commerce, to require the common carrier to discharge his functions as a common carrier, and the excuse of a railroad company that it is not able to employ men is not a sufficient excuse. Let me take an extreme illustration. Say that a company offers to pay its men 12½ cents a day, that the men refuse to accept such compensation, that the company can not find others who will work for such wages, that you buy a ticket for a certain train upon that road, go to the depot at the hour advertised and ask the company to fulfill their contract. They say, "No; we can not do it; we have no employés." You say, "Why have you not employés?" "Why," they reply, "because we have offered the men 12½ cents a day and they want 15." Your answer would be, "Very well; pay them 15." The excuse of the company would not be regarded as sufficient, either by the public or by any court. They can not come before a court and say that because of their own avarice, because of an insufficient payment of their men, they are unable to discharge their functions as common carriers, and are therefore to be excused. No court would exempt them upon that ground. It would require them to perform their duties.

FISH OR CUT BAIT.

In such a case what then would remain for the railway company to do? Why, to throw up its franchise as a common carrier. It must either perform its duty as a carrier, or it must go out of the business. But some one says, "If it goes out of the business, what becomes of the road?" The road stays just where it is and as it is and belongs to the State. That is what becomes of it! It is a public highway; and some day, before this great question is settled, Congress will reach the point where it will recognize every railway simply and solely as a public highway. It will concede that a given company as a common carrier has the exclusive franchise of carrying freight and passengers upon a certain road, so long as it performs that duty; but, if it sees fit to throw up or forfeit this franchise, then it will be held that the Government, or the State, can offer the use of that public highway to any other common carrier who will operate the road; and I fancy that just there will ultimately be found the settlement of this question. When these corporations ascertain the fact that they can not go on with impunity outraging the public, failing or refusing to perform their duties, and attempting to create a public sentiment against their employés in that way, but that they may forfeit their franchise as common carriers, they will come to terms and act with a reasonable amount of decency.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the limitations and obligations arrising from the nature of the subject.

REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC DOCTRINES AS TO THE POWER OF CONGRESS.

I come now to the question of the power of Congress to legislate upon this matter. Here you find two broad and differing faiths.

There prevails in some quarters, usually among our Democratic brethren, the idea of a strict construction of the constitutional powers of the General Government—the doctrine of State rights. On the other hand you have the broader doctrine of the power of the National Government to protect the people, to defend and maintain the "general welfare." I question no gentleman's sincerity in his opinions on this subject, nor his right to apply them; nor do I say that upon this bill there will be any party lines, because there may be Democrats and Republicans voting on both sides of it. I simply say that, in a general way, the Democratic doctrine is that of supreme State rights in State territory, alleged under the strictest construction of the Constitution; and, in a general way, the Republican doctrine is that of a Government strong enough and wise enough to protect its people, no matter what may be the form of attack, nor where. You have these doctrines, thus broadly distinguished, in their application to this question. I venture to suggest that if there is to be any relief to the people from the oppressions of railway corporations it will only be obtained by an exercise of the Republican idea of constitutional power, rather than by any measure based upon the doctrine so generally and distinctively entertained by the Democratic party.

RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLE IN A RAILWAY STRIKE.

For, sir, in a railway strike there are really three parties. There is, first, the railway company, with its rights; there is, second, the employés, who have their rights; but there is a third and infinitely larger party in interest—that is, the people who are affected on the one hand by the carrying of freights and passengers, and on the other by the suspension of traffic. To illustrate this: Suppose a strike should be maintained for twelve months. Suppose a merchant in my State should have bought from an importer in New York goods upon a credit of ninety days. Suppose that the importer should have given him the credit because of his belief that these goods could be carried to Kansas and disposed of promptly, and thus the notes be met. A strike comes. The goods can not be delivered at their destination, and the merchant is bankrupted. In such a case has the importer no rights affected by the strike? Has the merchant at home no rights affected by the strike? And suppose (I am using an extreme illustration)—suppose the community in my State should be dependent upon the goods brought in, and that for a year they should be deprived of groceries and other merchandise entering into the comforts or constituting the necessaries of life; have they no rights? Has not the man who is waiting for these things and can not get them, has not the wife or the child who may be in need of food or medicine for the preservation of life, any rights affected by this continued strike? Has the farmer who is unable to sell or ship his products no rights? Is not the "general welfare" affected? Has not the Government the power to protect these masses—this third party in interest as distinguished from the other interests? We, as Republicans, hold that it has.

EFFECTIVE RELIEF CAN ONLY BE FURNISHED BY REPUBLICAN PRINCIPLES AND THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

More than that, the sympathies of the Republican party, from the day it was organized until now, have been with the masses as against all oppressing powers, no matter how great. Their sympathies were with the slave as against the master. Their sympathies were with the Union as opposed to the war of secession. Their sympathies have been with the people from that day to this. And on this question their sympathies will always be against corporations and for the great broad masses, no matter how poorly clad, no matter how poorly paid—the poorer they may be the greater will be the sympathy of the Republican party. And when these sympathies shall take hold of the Republican interpretations of the Constitution and so apply them as to compel common carriers to perform their duties, then, gentlemen, you will have relief, but not till then; and so far as Democratic gentlemen, holding different opinions of the Constitution, may take part in securing this relief, they must to that extent waive the distinctive opinions of the great majority of their party in both Houses of Congress. I do not mean to say that the sympathies of very many of our Democratic brethren are not with the masses, not at all. I am discussing this question on a high plane as to general doctrines and general facts in their specific effect and application to this great problem of the future.

Now we, as Republicans, hold that under the "general welfare" clause of the Constitution this Government has the power to compel any railway, whether within a single State or in more than one State, whether its charter be derived from the General Government or from a State, to perform its duties, in so far as the failure to perform those duties may injuriously affect the general welfare; and it is only by a logical and forceful application of this constitutional power to these corporations, rigidly compelling the faithful discharge of their duties as public servants, that any real and lasting relief can be obtained and maintained.

POWER OVER INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

But leaving the "general welfare" clause, there ought to be no question as to the power conferred upon Congress by the clause to regulate commerce among the States. Congress, in the exercise of this power, may pass a law compelling the discharge by common carriers of their duties to the public in the transportation of commerce. There can be no question of that; and on this point I wish to make a further suggestion. Concede the opinion entertained by our friends on the other side that we have no power over a purely State road—admit that for a moment; still there is no railway in the United States that does not by its authorized agents issue through bills of lading and sell through tickets; and while, upon the construction referred to, the Government might not have the power to compel that road to carry, say, the ninety-nine passengers who were passengers only within the State, yet if there were a hundredth man holding a through ticket it would have the power to compel the company to carry him as an interstate passenger; and the same remark will apply to freight. Every citizen of a State is also a citizen of the United States, and as such is entitled to its protecting power on each acre of the United States, and on every wave or shore which the flag can brighten or a shot reach.

SCOPE OF EFFECTIVE LEGISLATION.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my opinion as to what should be the scope, nature, and force of legislation on this subject. First as to its scope: it should be such regulation of the common carriers as shall secure the best and speediest transit of commerce at the lowest rates.

Mr. REAGAN. Before my friend passes away from this constitutional subject, will he allow me a question?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. REAGAN. Would it be competent for Congress, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to enact a law providing that persons engaged in transportation of interstate commerce may have their grocers' bills and other merchants' bills adjudicated in such Federal tribunal?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No; I do not think it would.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it not as competent as to create a tribunal to treat questions between transporters of interstate commerce and their employés and laborers?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No; I do not think it would have power to regulate merchants' bills, but I do think it would have this power: to say to the holder of a railway franchise: "As the only common carrier on this public highway you must perform the duties imposed by the terms of that franchise. While we do not claim the power to say what price you shall pay for sugar, coffee, labor, or anything else, yet we have the power to say that you must run that road so long as you hold the franchise—we do not care what you pay for anything, but you shall run your trains; that is the point; that you must either operate the road in accordance with the franchise granted to you, or else surrender the franchise, and we will by law compel you to do one or the other." Congress has the power to force a common carrier to do his work, and nothing can excuse him from doing that work except the act of God or of the public enemy. And if he does not do the work, then he should be compelled to do it. But this is a wholly different point from the one proposed by my friend, in whose efforts to regulate interstate commerce I heartily join.

But as to the scope of the legislation which we should enact on this subject, as I have already indicated, I hold it should be as broad as is necessary to compel the best and speediest transit of commerce at the lowest rates. We have, certainly in my opinion, the constitutional power to act to that extent, and our action should be as broad as the limits of the power.

NATURE OF EFFECTIVE LEGISLATION.

Secondly, as to the nature of that legislation. How can you best appoint an agent to act for you? There are thousands of questions which will arise, and which must be promptly examined and decided. To my mind the best agent would be a United States commission—and at the proper time I shall move an amendment covering that point—and such a commission should be permanent, for the reason that an agent who is not permanent could not render the required service—a commission created by Congress and appointed by the President, clothed with authority to ascertain at any and all times whether common carriers are discharging their duties, and, if not, why they are not. Such a commission should have full power to ascertain what are the real difficulties in the way, and to advise Congress what additional remedial legislation is necessary in the premises.

My first objection to the bill before the House is that it is a purely temporary agency. It is based on the idea that when a company and its employés get into a difficulty one of them may, not shall, appoint an arbitrator, and the other may appoint an arbitrator, and these two may appoint a third. If the company does not want to arbitrate it need not do so. There is no compulsion about it. Therefore if the bill were a law to-day what difference would it make to Manager Hoxie? That gentleman, clothing himself in royal purple and Gould, sat back in his chair for weeks and said he would not even so much as treat with his employés, wholly regardless of the rights of the public; and he would only laugh at your law and refuse to appoint his arbitrator. Then where would you be? Just where we are now.

Instead of such an agency, instead of one merely temporary, which would disappear when a strike ended, I think in dealing with the future problem, as well as with the present conditions, it would be far wiser that we should have a national commission, clothed with national authority, sitting permanently, studying all the facts of the problem, suggesting legislation, so that hereafter we may be better able to act than we are now, because of our better acquaintance with the exact factors of the problem and their inter-relations with each other and the whole.

POWER NECESSARY TO MAKE LEGISLATION EFFECTIVE.

The next question is what degree and character of power should be given to such a commission. The word "arbitrate" means "to decide, to determine." All through this debate gentlemen have spoken of arbitration as if it could only be a voluntary thing. It may be voluntary, and in law is always voluntary. In the late strike, and I am glad it is reported this morning to be settled, under existing law those men had power to select arbitrators in that way. All the additional power your bill would give them is that the arbitrators named under it would be able to ascertain the facts in a case by legal examination. What would become of the facts? What would become of the record? Where would be the transcript of the proceedings? What good would it do to us or to the country? None whatever. Furthermore, in voluntary arbitration you do not need the examination of witnesses, but when you come to a wholly different thing, namely, to compulsory arbitration, so to speak, or to an exercise of the power of the sovereign through arbitrators in compelling a public servant as common carrier to perform his obligation, there you want power. And any law offering only voluntary arbitration in my judgment will fail immensely of the desirable and essential results, simply because of a lack of power; and that is my main objection to the bill before us.

But when such power is suggested gentlemen talk vigorously about "moral suasion!" Just how much does Mr. Jay Gould care about "moral suasion?" How much does Mr. Hoxie care about public opinion? If Jay Gould, as alleged by the New York Herald of last Sunday, can make out of this strike, by the depreciation of stocks and their enhancement after the strike is terminated, a large fortune, say $20,000,000, do you not think that $20,000,000 would soothe any wounds that might have been made in his generous and philanthropic soul by "public opinion?" That "moral-suasion" dodge is too unutterably thin! [Laughter.]

It is not, Mr. Chairman, a question of moral suasion; it is a question of the protection of the people. It is not a question as to the possible effect of public opinion upon railway managers, paid $25,000 a year; it is as to the effect upon the people of this country. To propose "moral suasion" as a bulwark against the brains and greed of corporations is to leave their employés and the masses wholly defenseless. What you want is authority greater than their power, backed by the whole force of the United States Government, and the people will be satisfied with nothing less.

THE POWER PROPOSED BY THE ANDERSON BILL.

But the bill reported by the Labor Committee has neither such power nor the semblance of any power whatever. In the bill which I introduced it was proposed that the commission should have compulsory backing. It contemplated three groups or sections of three members each, and that there should be an examination by a section with stenographic evidence and a decision. Then in case the arbitration is refused, a reference of the matter to the whole commission, and finally the revision and action by a United States court, in the nature of a judicial decree, with a penalty of fine or imprisonment for contempt.

To such an arbitration, and the exercise of such power, the answer is made that you can not compel employés to work, that they might refuse the arbitration made by the commission. Of course they might! That proposition is entirely correct. And my friend from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] I think said on yesterday that this was a dangerous power to vest in a court, that the court would imprison employés for not working. What is the legal right of the employé? Not to work. If he does not choose to work you can not imprison him for not so choosing.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No, I did not exactly say that; I said that under the provisions of your bill it could be done.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. My friend will pardon me, but he is certainly mistaken. Neither under the provisions of my bill, nor under any existing law, could any freeman be imprisoned for refusing to work for a railroad company. The sole power of the commission, as contemplated by it, would be advisory, and either party might reject its decision. That power would spring from two sources: First, from a belief of the contending parties that it had ascertained all the facts, and that its decision was impartially rendered; and second, from a similar belief by the people, thus forming and focusing public opinion. Beyond this the commission would be without power, and wholly devoid of even the semblance of legal force. So that the arbitration, so far as the commission is concerned, would be voluntary and not compulsory, in fact of less force than under a legal arbitration, to an acceptance of which the parties must always have previously agreed. The proceeding would retain this character until a United States court, after an examination of the evidence and findings, should render its decision in the nature of a judicial decree, to be enforced when necessary by the penalty for contempt of court. At this point the legal power of the United States would act in the punishment of offenses and in the enforcement of obligations.

DECREE OF A UNITED STATES COURT AS TO EMPLOYÉS.

But what would be that decree? Who would be the parties, and what their character and obligations? On the one hand would be a corporation created by law, the creature of the State, and dependent for life and powers upon the legislative will; a legal fiction, holding the monopolistic franchise to use a public highway as a common carrier for the public good, and subject to the legislative will of the people. On the other hand would be a freeman, created by God, a sovereign inherently coequal with other men, a citizen of the United States protected and empowered by its liberty, and as such royally free to work or not to work for another at his own pleasure. Is there any judge anywhere who would decree that such a man must work against his will, in utter violation of the innate and legal liberty of every man? That would be slavery in its grossest and most abhorrent form. No court in Christendom either would or could make such a decree, and hence there could be no imprisonment of the man as being in contempt of a decree never rendered.

The only thing the court might decree as to him would be, that this man should not by violence or intimidation prevent other men from working for the company. But this is precisely what may be done under existing laws, and just what the Gould managers may rightfully invoke the whole power of State and National Government to enforce. The moment any man, striker or not, shall resort to unlawful acts, the whole machinery of the law, and, if necessary, of the State and nation, will and must be used to secure obedience and preserve the public peace. To hold otherwise than this is to hold that the third party, the masses, have no rights; and to do otherwise is to permit anarchy to subvert all government.

ARE ONLY THE STRIKERS TO BE PUNISHED AND THE CORPORATIONS TO GO UNPUNISHED?

But what law has been invoked to ascertain whether the companies have committed illegal acts; whether, playing upon the spirit and necessities of their employés with an assured certainty of the result, they themselves, for speculative effect and gains in the stock market, as charged by the New York Herald, have forced the strike, and, if so, are the real "conspirators" against the public good; whether the mere refusal to work of employés who commit no unlawful act is a valid excuse for the failure of a public carrier to run trains; whether a penalty for the non-performance of this public duty shall be enforced, and whether a regular and continued performance of such duty shall be secured to the people? In all these past weeks what United States district attorney, or judge, or President, or what officer of a State has taken official action toward protecting the rights of the people by invoking any law against a breach of service by the companies? Is there no law or no officer charged with its execution? Then certainly there should be both, and at once! Is there to be an enforcement of law only against the illegal acts of day laborers, perhaps at the point of the bayonet, but no enforcement as rigidly against the equally illegal acts of incorporated millionaires, while at any moment or for any period the public may helplessly suffer?

These are the issues and that is the problem, illustrated by the late strike and liable to recur anywhere, which Congress must meet. For, mind you, no matter what may have been the relative rights and wrongs of the parties in that struggle, nor how great the patience of the people, in this coming era of combinations, and combinations of the millions against a score of corporations, these millions, whose patriotic regard for law and good government is quite equal to that of any millionaire, being voters, will sooner or later secure their just rights by law. And if it be true that we are now without law to ascertain and compel common carriers to discharge their duties as such, and without penalties for the punishment of illegal acts by corporations, these defects must sooner or later be remedied, and the sooner the better.

DECREE OF COURT AS TO RAILWAY COMPANY.

Such a remedy was proposed in my bill, as will be seen by the attitude and obligations of the company when brought before the court by the action of the commission. The very first proposition submitted would be that the failure to run its trains was a violation of its charter and subversive of public policy; that its excuse, as to the strike of employés, was insufficient and the result of its own avarice and arrogance; and that it should be required to perform the service of an exclusive carrier or forfeit its franchise as such. The question would not be one of arbitration between employer and employé—that was concluded by the action of the commission; the question would now be whether the corporation was bound to perform its lawful service, and whether the people had any rights in that service which it should be made to respect, even if the whole power and army of the United States should be necessary.

In the event that the court found the company to be without valid excuse it would be apt to say: "We have nothing to do with the question of wages or other differences between you and your men; you are a creature of the Government, empowered to act as a common carrier, and holding an exclusive franchise from the Government to perform this work upon a great public road, as the servant of the people and for the public good; its non-performance would injuriously and dangerously affect the general welfare; you have the right to surrender your franchise, and may do so at pleasure; but so long as you hold it, you must perform the service with regularity and at any sacrifice of pride or cash; our decree is that you at once run your trains, and that you do or pay whatever you find necessary thereto. Should you disobey this decree by failing to run all trains as advertised, we will commit your directors and manager to prison until they purge themselves of contempt by rendering such obedience."

Just one such decision, or even the possibility of it, would forever prevent railroad strikes in the United States, and assure permanent enforcement of the rights of the public to uninterrupted commerce. Not only would such a law be constitutional, but it would furnish an officer charged with its execution in any emergency, and would allay all that danger of lawlessness which comes from the widespread feeling that there is neither law nor punishment for corporations. The imprisonment of a batch of railroad directors would speedily teach all men that while the Government is strong enough to punish day laborers it is also strong and just enough to punish millionaires, and to protect both laborer and the public from ruthless piracy by any corporation.

Here was a proposition to do something; one recognizing the just rights of all the parties in interest, and dealing equally with all, and it was discussed and considered by the Labor Committee. So far as the arbitration by the commission is concerned that was wholly without penalty; neither the company nor the employé could be bound or punished by it, and hence the rights of each were equal. As to a decree of court that decree would be against any unlawful deed of the men just as is now the case; but it might also be against an illegal act of the company, and just this was the real danger as foreseen by the railway lobby. At present either there is no law or certainly no enforcement of law against such illegal acts on railways, and the corporations prefer "to be let alone!"

INCAPACITY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

The bill reported by the Labor Committee vigorously "lets them alone!" It simply provides that in a contest, if both parties so agree, each may select an arbitrator who may select a third; that this board may take evidence at the expense of the United States and render a decision, but that neither party shall in any way be bound by it. That is the whole of it, and is just what the parties may do now, except as to the expense. From the corporation standpoint it is "harmless," and their lobby supports it. From the standpoint of State rights it is relatively "harmless." From my standpoint it is a mere shadow—the photograph of a tub thrown to a whale. Its only substance is in the title, and even that is a misnomer of the bill. The Democratic party has a majority of the committee and of the House; and while in neither may there be a vote on party lines, yet I make the point that such a proposed solution of such a problem may rightfully be regarded by the people as a test of Democratic statesmanship and principles. The chairman told us that "this bill was the best the committee could do." I believe it; and have no desire to see the worst that committee might do if it tried hard! This is quite enough for me as another evidence of Democratic incapacity, and likewise as a gorgeous specimen of Democratic "innocuous desuetude!" I strongly prefer something else; yet on the principle that even a crust is better than no loaf, I will vote for it as being better than nothing at all, but only in the respect that its enactment will be an assertion of the power of Congress to control railway corporations. I shall vote chiefly for the title of the bill as a protest against the Democratic idea of State sovereignty, and will risk the statement that not a single Republican will vote against the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I heard the remark made at my left a few moments since that this was a proper measure for new members to talk upon, "as it did not amount to much anyway," and that, sir, may be some excuse for my attempting to offer a few suggestions upon this bill, although I do not agree with the gentleman in the sentiment he expressed. A new member should not remain silent upon the question under consideration, however golden that silence may be.

The principle of submitting to arbitration all differences or controversies between man and man, or between the citizen on one side and the corporation on the other, is one that should be encouraged by every law-abiding citizen of the land and should be fostered by the Congress of the United States and the Legislatures of the States by just and proper legislation. The corporation or citizen that feels his "quarrel just" will always be found willing to arbitrate. The old-time hostility to this mode of settling controversies has long since disappeared. Why not? Arbitrators are judges chosen by the parties themselves, who, entering into an agreement to arbitrate, are acting rationally in their own business and without compulsion.

Let force and power yield to the honest award of competent arbitrators. None should be so low as to be deprived of this forum, none so high or powerful as to reject it with impunity. The business and industrial interests of the country demand that questions arising between labor and common carriers be adjusted, if possible, in this way rather than by strikes or lockouts. It is not, and I apprehend will not be, claimed by the advocates of this bill that it will harmonize all the difficulties between capital and labor, but that it is a step in the right direction I have no doubt. It says to the employé of the common carrier, if you believe you have been treated unjustly or oppressively either as to the amount of wages paid you, or as to the number of hours you are compelled to work, state your grievances to your employer and if no adjustment can be had, then ask that your differences be submitted to arbitration, and the General Government, in the interest of society, will defray the expenses attending such arbitration; thus placing the poorest citizen on an equality with the richest corporation.

Certain it is that public sentiment, the power in this country, will not justify the party to such a controversy which refuses so just and equitable a mode of settling disputes. The refusal will be taken as prima facie, if not conclusive, evidence of the injustice of the demands of the party refusing to arbitrate. Public opinion—that is, the judgment of the people—that court of last appeal in a republican form of government, will whip the refractory party into submission or grind it to powder under its wheels.

The wheels of commerce, the life of the nation, can not be blocked to meet the whim or caprice of any person or corporation, however great or strong.

This bill gives capital and labor an opportunity of meeting on equal terms to settle controversies growing out of the relations of employer and employé, and that without violence or wrong to either.

I do not agree, sir, with the opinions expressed upon this side or upon the other side of the House that all that is necessary to relieve the difficulties that labor seems to groan under in this country to-day is to solve the silver question, yet that might do much; and I certainly do not agree with the gentlemen who express the opinion that all we have to do to lift this burden from the shoulders of labor and to harmonize all questions between capital and labor is to adopt the British policy of free trade, to take away the protection that is given to American labor, that which dignifies it and assures it a proper remuneration. I would not bring American labor in competition with the half-paid and half-fed labor of Europe. I would not follow the lead of England either in the direction of free trade or monometallism.

I believe in the dignity of labor; I believe that "the laborer is worthy of his hire;" I believe in the right of labor to combine; I believe in its right to complain; I believe in its right to insist by all constitutional means for its rights.

But, sir, while this is true, I also believe that there is another principle as sacred, and which should be held as inviolate by all; that is, the rights of individuals in the enjoyment of the property they own, whether that property be the property of individuals or whether it be the property of corporations. I believe, in speaking thus, I give voice to the sentiment of the great laboring classes of this country.

It is true that labor feels that it has not been properly remunerated in the past; that corporations have grown rich while labor has been oppressed. We can not, if we would, shut our eyes to the fact that the inordinate desire for dividends on the one hand and the sense of neglect on the other have rendered the relations between capital and labor strained. Capital has organized, that greater returns may be had on its investments, labor has organized that it may be the better paid and protected. Each has learned that in "union there is strength."

Labor has but recently learned its power. Its true apostles insist that its power shall be used in a twofold manner, in demanding just compensation for an honest day's labor and protection to property. This has been illustrated in the recent past. Yet it can not be denied that under the name of labor acts of lawlessness have been committed.

These acts have been denounced by the true friends of labor. No man upon this floor should be the apologist for acts of violence, by whomsoever committed. It is the sacredness of a cause that makes men great and insures success; it is the camp-follower that resorts to acts of violence. While this is true, I am not disposed to extenuate the wanton disregard of the rights of labor in the past, the grinding of men in the dust of poverty, that dividends might be paid upon watered and fictitious stock.

Under this condition of affairs it is not strange that difficulties have arisen between these corporations, the great common carriers of the country and labor. These difficulties have resulted in millions of dollars of damage to the business of the country.

The purpose of the bill under discussion is to in part prevent recurrences of the strikes and lock-outs of the past, and to induce labor and capital, in a forum of their own selection, to adjust their controversies without violence to either and without disturbance of the business and commerce of the country. This, certainly, is a consummation devoutly to be wished. This bill, if it passes both Houses of Congress and receives the approval of the President, will say to common carriers and their employés it is the expressed wish of the legislative and executive branches of this Government that controversies between you that may affect the interest of the community shall be settled by arbitration, and that there may be no excuse the United States will pay all costs arising from such arbitration.

It has been stated by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], who is an eminent legislator, that there is no injury, no wrong without a remedy. That is a legal fiction. An illustrious and distinguished attorney who lives in the gentleman's State defined the legal maxim Damnum absque injunia "as a damnable injury without a remedy." [Laughter.] The translation is as forcible as it is liberal. There are many injuries that fall within the gentleman's liberal translation—injuries that are without a remedy—and therefore the necessity for this bill.

Yet gentlemen say this bill is so innocent that it is powerless for either good or evil, while other gentlemen think it violates the plain provisions of the Constitution and see in it great evils to the country. All claim that their opposition to the bill is because of their great solicitude for the laboring men. They, the constitutional objectors, prophesy evil and that continually if legislation such as this is had. Gentlemen, do not be unnecessarily alarmed; the Constitution is in no danger. This little bit of legislation in the interest of labor, the peace of society, the business interest of the community, will not strain, much less break, one of the least provisions of the Constitution. Take counsel of your hopes and not of your fears. Remove the corporation beam from your eyes and the constitutional objection to this bill may disappear.

In my judgment the Committee on Labor is to be congratulated that amid the excitement over the labor question, when false friends are anxious to rush to the front after the battle, as the champions of labor, armed with a "poor man's plaster" and a bottle of "labor-capital soothing syrup," demanding the abolition of corporations and that the curtains be rung down upon the oppressions of the past, and that the era of prosperity be ushered in by Congressional enactment—I say that amid all this the Committee on Labor is to be congratulated that they have brought in so plain, so wise, so conservative a bill as that under consideration by this House. Perfection is not claimed for the measure. It is believed by its friends that it will advance a remedy and redress an injury. There are some changes that I would have made in the bill, and shall at the proper time offer certain amendments.

In my opinion it is not wise to give to the board of arbitrators the unrestricted power of punishing for contempt conferred upon them under section 2 of the bill.

If this arbitrary power is given at all, it should be hedged about with clear and well-defined restrictions, so that the personal liberty of the citizen who may be adjudged to be in contempt of the board of arbitration shall not be left to the discretion of the arbitrators as to the extent of the fine or the duration of the imprisonment. In contempt cases, many judicial crimes have been committed under the spacious mantle, discretion; its drag-net has drawn many an innocent man to prison. Undefined, unlimited, judicial discretion is a constant menace to the liberties of the citizen.

The common-law idea that the king can do no wrong is by implication at least attributed to United States judges in the grant of undefined, unlimited, discretionary power in contempt cases. From their judgment in contempt cases there is no appeal. They summarily try and arbitrarily punish. The citizen is deprived of liberty without trial or jury; the pleasure of the judge, called judicial discretion, incarcerates or sets him free. It is certain that no such powers as these should be given the board of arbitration under this bill. I doubt the wisdom of conferring such powers on any man. Therefore these words "punishing for contempt" should be stricken out or the power of punishing for contempt restricted. If these words are not stricken out or modified in their operations it may be claimed that the board of arbitration created by this act possesses the powers of United States courts to punish by fine and imprisonment at their discretion without trial or appeal.

It is an anomaly, to say the least, that such an unlimited power should be vested in any court or tribunal in a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, the constitution of which guarantees to every citizen accused with crime the right of a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury, which entitles him to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor and provides counsel for his defense, which has gone even further and guaranteed him a jury trial in all cases at law where the amount involved exceeds $20. Therefore let us not by a possible construction even clothe this board with such power of doubtful expediency if not dangerous to the liberties of the citizen. It should be borne in mind that individual rights are of the first importance; that law is only a means to secure them. I trust the committee will consent to the amendment indicated.

It is claimed upon this floor by gentlemen who assume to speak for the great laboring classes of this country that this bill is a snare, a cheat, a fraud upon the credulity of the masses of laborers of the land. Mr. Chairman, I fail to see wherein the bill is either a snare, a cheat, or a fraud. It is no false light upon the shore to allure either capital or labor to destruction. It is a plain, simple proposition; so plain that the wayfaring man, although a member of Congress, may understand its provisions.

Let me say to the gentleman that, from my knowledge of the intelligence of the men composing the labor organizations of the country, they are abundantly able to decide for themselves as to the merits of this or any other measure that shall come before Congress. By their recent action they have by persistent efforts shown not only their willingness but their anxiety to settle by arbitration matters in dispute between them and the common carriers. In this laudable desire the great business interests of the country join.

The further objection is urged that any award made by the board of arbitrators would be a mere nullity, that it could in no way be enforced. Upon this proposition I take issue. In my judgment that position is not tenable. Here the statute provides for an award, but fails to point out any mode for its enforcement. It does not, therefore, follow that the award is a mere nullity. The submission being voluntary, the award will be enforced in courts having common law jurisdiction upon action brought for its enforcement; that is, in all cases where the award is based upon controversies growing out of contracts expressed or implied, and in other cases where the matters in controversy submitted to arbitration are of a class upon which courts can enter judgments.

It has been repeatedly held, in cases arising upon awards under statutory modes of arbitration, where the statute pointed out the manner in which the awards could be enforced by the courts, that the parties might proceed at common law for the non-performance of an award by an action on the award in any court having common-law jurisdiction. As this bill provides no manner for the enforcement of the award, certainly the common-law mode its the enforcement remains. These principles are supported by authorities cited in Morse on Arbitration and Award. The position I apprehend can not be successfully controverted; but back and beyond all legal remedies for the enforcement of these awards there is the great conservative public opinion that would go far toward compelling an honest performance of the awards made by the board of arbitrators selected under the provisions of this bill.

It is the first legislation by Congress looking to an amicable adjustment of controversies between common carriers and their employés—it is no objection that the legislation is conservative in its scope and plain in its provisions. Time will demonstrate whether it will meet the hopes of its friends and, as I believe, the true friends of labor, or whether it will need supplemental legislation to accomplish the purposes intended—the amicable adjustment of controversies between capital and labor—within the scope indicated by the bill.

Again, it is claimed by some that this bill should be entitled "A bill to prevent arbitration." I fail to see the force of the suggestion. It takes away no rights of arbitration that now exist at common law or otherwise. It supplements the right of the class of persons named under existing law to arbitrate controversies. It lends the influence of the General Government to arbitrate. Yes, sir, and this bill does more; it gives the arbitrators full power to examine witnesses, to send for persons and papers. It enables each party to have his side of the controversy investigated, the evidence under oath made public, that it may be read of all men that they, the public, may judge as to the merits of the controversy. It says to the corporations and laborers that the rights of each one shall be fully protected; that arbitration should be resorted to rather than lockouts or strikes; that the great commercial interest of the country ought not to be and shall not be paralyzed by the discontinuance of business on the part of railroad companies growing out of questions as to the rights of the employés, rather than submit those questions of difference to the judgment of three honest, disinterested arbitrators.

Arbitration should do away with strikes by removing the cause. When arbitration is agreed upon the Government furnishes the machinery and the necessary expenses attending the investigation, thus placing the corporation and the citizen upon a common plane. It takes away no rights from either party to the controversy, be that party the railroad or the humblest laborer. Sir, I am a firm believer in arbitration of questions in dispute, whether between nations or individuals.

Corporations are continually knocking at the doors of Congress asking legislation in their interest. The Government has done much for them in the past; let them now know from this legislation that it is the expressed wish of the American people that arbitration rather than lockouts is the way to settle labor controversies. This expression by Congress alone is worth much to the people of this country. I therefore give the general provisions of the bill my cheerful support.

There are those who say you can not by legislation do anything that shall even tend to settle the struggle between capital and labor—"the question of the ages," as they are pleased to term it. That our province as legislators is to stand aside, and let the struggle between these forces go on, without any attempt to bring about a better understanding between them. They tell us that a "wiser and a stronger hand than ours is leading in this struggle." That "He that doth the ravens feed, yea, providently caters for the sparrow," within His good time, in some mysterious way, will adjust this "question of the ages," and having said this much, they fold their hands, as if momentarily expecting to hear a voice above, and beyond humanity, saying to the mad waves of contention, "Peace, be still!"

I believe that human effort, human power, human sympathy, should be exerted in the settlement of this great question, and that we can not sit here as idle spectators. Something more is required than mere denunciation of the rapacity of corporations or glowing tributes to labor, or "child-like and bland" confidence in Providence to meet the questions growing out of the strained relations between labor and common carriers.

While I yield to no man in my abiding faith in the ability and genius of the American people to work out in time a successful solution of the difficulties now existing, or that may arise, yet it is the plain duty of Congress, as well as the Legislatures of the States, to use all constitutional power to aid in bringing about that solution at the earliest possible day and in a manner that shall least shock the business interest of society, and at the same time do equal and exact justice to all concerned. I would encourage the settlement of all questions affecting the rights of labor as well as those of the employer by arbitration rather than by the force of mere numbers, the policeman's club, or the bayonet of the soldiery.

I am not as sanguine as some as to the benefits to be obtained from this measure, yet I believe its influence will be on the side of justice and peace.

That it reflects the sentiment of our people, who believe in "fair play," in placing the employer and the employé on the same footing in the settlement of disputes, without contemplating violence or injustice to the rights of either, therefore I am for the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the remaining five minutes of the hour belong to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the bill under consideration reported by the chairman of the committee [Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri], and shall give it my cordial support. I am persuaded to this action because, in my judgment, if the bill shall become a law it will have a tendency to elevate, dignify the rights of labor. The conflict now going on, and which has been growing and taking shape in this country for more than fifteen years between corporations on the one side and the individual citizen on the other, demands legislation hitherto unknown to our jurisprudence. This is true, not so much by the action of the individual, as through the policy adopted by the States in granting extraordinary corporate rights to aggregated wealth. The ordinary rules of law governing personal rights do not meet the exigencies of the situation. This is so because both sides do not stand on a platform of equality. The person must answer for his own individual acts, and though provoked to deeds of violence by the oppression of hard masters, yet the provocation, however just, is no shield from punishment. But who answers for the corporations? There is no law, statutes or common, that will reach and punish her so long as she acts within her corporate capacity, when under the direction of bad influences she may adopt a course of action that will impoverish whole communities. And yet the people must stand in silence with no power for redress.

There is, however, one tribunal before which the highest in the land will bow in humble submission, and that is the tribunal of public judgment. No man, no body of men, can any more withstand the breath of public sentiment than they can blow away with a breath the mist that comes up from the ocean. Let us then pass this bill, with a view of affording a means whereby difference arising between parties therein referred to may be adjusted without resorting to strikes, violence, or military force.

Voluntary arbitration seems to be the desired remedy. It will satisfy the men, it will be accepted by the corporations, and it will be approved by the people.

Mr. LONG. I for one am not only willing to vote for this bill, but I am satisfied that it is well drawn; that it is in line with prudent legislation and with sound thinking; that it is adapted to the present exigencies of the labor problem; that it is wise in what it does not attempt quite as much as in what it does attempt, and that we ought to pass it in the form in which the committee have reported it to us.

In the first place I am in favor of this bill because public sentiment has now reached, I believe, the point of recognizing arbitration as the opening door of the philosophy of adjusting the conflicts between labor and capital. The principle of arbitration has been recognized and adopted by several States of the Union in their legislation after mature consideration of the matter. It has been adopted by some of the leading nations of Europe. And this bill, so far from committing us to any blind experiment, simply adopts within the national jurisdiction an agency of social and industrial economics which has already been adopted and tested in other political entities.

In the second place, I want to call attention to one element of value in this matter of arbitration in industrial frictions which has not been adverted to. Arbitration is very valuable, not only as affording a means for the assertion of a claim, but it is often a thousand times more valuable as a means for the modification or withdrawal of a claim. It is within the experience of all of us that labor and capital go apart, strikes occur, lockouts follow, and the agony widens out of all proportion to its originating cause. If I am not in error with reference to the recent troubles on the Missouri Pacific railroad system, they have been altogether disproportioned to the importance of the discharge of the individual employé which gave rise to those troubles. Pride of opinion, as we all know, and the unwillingness to seem to back down often prevent a settlement which would otherwise be an easy matter. Both parties frequently would gladly welcome the decision of an arbitrator, no matter what that decision might be, so long as it settled the difference at all. It would often be a relief to the complaining party himself to have his complaint overruled rather than suffer all the consequences and all the evils which are liable to follow as the entail of a long unsettlement. Pass this bill, and you have made possible an early and easy settlement of difficulties which otherwise may grow into revolutions; you have invoked adjudication in the place of those gigantic antagonisms which are liable to rend us to pieces; you have accomplished just what the railroad-commission system has accomplished in my own State of Massachusetts—a commission which has not a particle of coercive power, which can not enforce a decree, which can only recommend. It hears, it investigates, it recommends, that is all; and yet such is its force under this power of public sentiment which has been referred to that in no instance has its recommendation ever failed to be complied with, no matter how gigantic or powerful or rich the corporation or how humble the complainant.

In the third place, I am for this bill because it is by no means so valueless as has been represented. It has other virtues than the virtue of being merely harmless. The bill is a positive force. It does something more than simply declare, what is already true, that one man having a grievance against another may enter into an arbitration over it with him if both agree to do so. What I say is this: If, without this law, any humble employé of a powerful railroad corporation should to-day ask that corporation to enter into an arbitration with him over a difference between them, the chances, as you know, are a hundred to one that in any ordinary case the corporation would decline and would wave him away. You also know—such is the power of the expression of the representatives of the people, such is the power of an act of the American Congress—that if you pass this bill, then let the humblest workingman demand of the corporation that employs him an arbitration, let him demand it under the sanction of an act of Congress, and the chances are a hundred to one that it will be granted, or that, to avoid refusing it, an adjustment will be made. In that way you insure to him a hearing; and let me say—and I say this to the credit of the wisdom of the Committee on Labor—you insure it to him pretty much as substantially as if you had put a compulsory provision into the bill.

There is one other provision in this bill which is a fourth reason in my mind for voting for it and for asserting that it is not merely a declaration of an existing right. It is a provision of the utmost importance to the workingman, and one which makes the bill anything but valueless to him. To-day no such workingman entering into a voluntary arbitration with a corporation could afford to pay the expense of prosecuting such an arbitration to its conclusion. Indeed, the anticipated cost of such an arbitration would probably prevent him from entering into an arbitration at all. The result is that, being unable to bear the cost of arbitration, he makes his complaint to his fellow-employés, a bitter feeling is fomented, and a strike follows.

Pass this bill with this fifth section in it, and you provide that the employé, however poor, engaging in an arbitration of this character shall have the expense of his arbitrators, of his witnesses, of the clerk, of the stenographer—all the expenses of the arbitration—paid out of the United States Treasury. And let me tell you it will be a mighty cheap price to pay if it will tend to avoid such an experience as we have had within the last few weeks in the State of Missouri, with the attendant damage and loss that have followed from it to all classes of the community. Pass the bill with this section, and you have put the humblest workingman upon an equality in this respect with the richest employer. There is no longer anything to prevent the hearing of any matter in dispute without oppressive expense to one side or the other and upon fair and equal terms. The result will be not the multiplicity of these complaints or suits, but their infrequency. The very power to invoke arbitration will prevent its invocation, as every man who is familiar with human nature knows, because the party in the wrong will sooner do justice than have that power invoked, and because no man who has not a good cause of complaint will be in a hurry to have its weakness and fallacy exposed to the light of an investigating arbitration.

I am for this bill, then, because it is on the whole a good bill, and especially because it is a temperate bill; because it does not undertake too much; because, while it meets public sentiment, it goes only as far as public sentiment has now gone. It opens the door to peaceful adjustment of difficulties. It turns the minds of the people in the direction of adjudication, and not in the direction of revolution or violence. It works no harm. It accomplishes a good purpose. The committee are entitled to credit for having brought it here in so moderate a form, and I trust we shall pass it as they have presented it to us. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, was recognized.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY].

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to address the committee at this time.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOUND].

Mr. BOUND. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was first introduced into the House of Representatives and reported from the committee I had no thought of making any remarks in regard to it. It was so plain and simple in its provisions and yet so comprehensive of the objects aimed at, that I imagined the wayfaring man, though a fool, could see its purpose at a glance. And yet, until the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] addressed this committee, the object of the bill appeared to have escaped the scrutiny of gentlemen who seem to be astute constitutional lawyers, gentlemen who understand legislation fully, and the Constitution from a to z. I did not imagine that a man could take up this bill and look even at the first section of it and at the provisions there contained and possibly mistake its object. The object of the bill is not to settle questions of damages between railroad corporations and their employés; it is not to settle questions of how much money shall pass for an injury done to an employé, or how much damages a railroad company shall receive.

That whenever differences or controversies arise between common carriers engaged in the transportation of property or passengers, whether said common carriers be private persons or corporations, * * * which differences or controversies may hinder, impede, obstruct, interrupt, or affect such transportation of property or passengers, or when such employés, or any of them, allege that he or they have been treated unjustly or oppressively, either as to wages, hours of labor, or otherwise, by such common carrier, if, upon the written proposition of either party to the controversy to submit their differences to arbitration, the other party shall accept the proposition, then and in such event the common carrier is hereby authorized to select and appoint, &c.

Is there a word said in any portion of this bill about mulcting any one in damages? The committee, who had all these bills before them, and carefully scrutinized and scanned their provisions, looked attentively at the remedy sought as between the laborers and employés on the one side and these giant corporations on the other. We regarded this bill in committee, and we look upon it to-day, as providing a poor man's court—a tribunal, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, where the humblest citizen can go before three men, impartially selected, make his complaint, and have all the difficulties and controversies between the railroad employé and the employer adjusted upon satisfactory terms; and the results of this inquiry when reached are not only to be announced publicly by the tribunal itself, but to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Labor at Washington, to be filed as a perpetual memorial.

I suggest that no railroad corporation of this land will disregard the provisions of this "harmless" bill. It has a weight and power behind it that will be stronger than courts and juries. It is to open the way for the humblest citizen to go before a tribunal composed of his fellow-citizens and ask redress of his grievances. The corporation, with its millions at its back, can at any time command the services of the most astute counsel. What is the power of the ordinary citizen to-day in a court of justice in a suit against a corporation, where his individual rights are concerned? The corporations have power to command the best legal talent; and I am happy to say they do so in all controversies affecting their corporate rights. Upon mere questions of law, in any tribunal in this country, I care not how pure or how wise may be the jurist upon the bench, if you rely simply upon technical rules, and your antagonist is a corporation, that corporation will have counsel to trip your feet at every step, so that you will never get beyond the portals of the court. In this way the doors of the courts are, for practical purposes, perpetually closed against the poor man, or the man of moderate means, when he seeks redress of grievances against one of these powerful corporations; and any lawyer who has ever practiced before a court or a jury knows this just as well as I do.

This bill proposes to provide, in controversies of this kind between employer and employé, a settlement that can not be reached under the ordinary forms of law or any rules of arbitration now in force. It takes hold of abstract principles, and inquires into the respective rights of employer and employé.

But I had not intended to discuss even to this extent the provisions of this bill. I rose for an entirely different purpose. I was sorry to hear opprobrious epithets applied to a bill of this kind, so wise in its provisions, so just, so comprehensive, so well calculated to guard the rights of the poor man—the laborer and the mechanic, no matter where employed—against the avarice, the rapacity, the power and influence of combined and organized capital, whether invested in railroads or otherwise. My object mainly at this time was to reply to insinuations which have been cast upon members of the committee who have given so much thought and time to the preparation of so "harmless" a bill. Astute gentlemen here seem not to have comprehended its provisions or intent until the gentleman from Massachusetts for the first time indicated what the committee sought in reporting this bill.

But I wish to reply to insinuations thrown out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]. Honored and respected as he has been during a service of twenty-five years as a legislator in the Halls of Congress, and pretending to be a friend of the poor man, the laboring man, and the mechanic, I ask him what has he done in this direction? What remedy has he proposed in his wisdom and experience? I ask him whether it becomes him to tell this committee that the bill they have reported to the House is a "fraud" upon the laboring man and "a cheat?" As a humble member of the committee, I repel for myself, with all the scorn of which I am capable, the insinuation or the accusation that this committee has introduced a bill which is a "cheat" or a "fraud" either upon grave legislators in this Hall or upon the laboring men of the country. The common people understand its provisions; they know what the bill is, though it may not be clear to the comprehension of astute lawyers, who seem to want double-back-action spectacles in order to comprehend the plainest provision on the statute-book, and who look aghast for fear that a measure of this kind may injure a comma, or pierce a semicolon, or knock the eye out of a period. [Laughter.] They must grope through the Constitution and through the books of judicial decisions in order to find out whether there is not something hidden, something covert; and then they come and say to a respectable committee of this House, composed of as honorable and fair-minded men as any here, that their bill is a "cheat" and a "fraud." Is it dignified, is it worthy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or of any other member here, to thus speak of a committee of the House and their work—work done in a sincere and earnest spirit, for the purpose of accomplishing the object set forth in the bill? It seems to me that any schoolboy reading this bill must understand its provisions and its mode of settling differences between employers and employed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The subject has been so thoroughly discussed——

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me, before he commences his speech, for a moment only?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments are not in order until after 4 o'clock, and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I think it is only necessary now to defend the committee from one charge, made by some members here, of this bill being a hasty and ill-considered one. During the past two months the Committee on Labor have exhausted every means in their power to obtain the amplest information on labor questions. The opinions of men who have made the subject of political economy a study, the heads of leading labor organizations of the country, and of intelligent capitalists, and I propose now, in speaking on an arbitration bill which appeals to reason, simply to read the views which they have furnished so far as they relate to this question.

I am indebted to some extent to the intelligent discussion of various phases of the labor question conducted during the past three months under the auspices of a leading trade journal published in the interest of manufacturers and workmen alike. (I refer to the Age of Steel, printed at Saint Louis.) A letter sent to that paper by myself as chairman of the Committee on Labor helped to direct the discussion. Among other questions of the hour of vital interest to employer and employé was asked: "Is arbitration the missing coupling between capital and labor?" The responses came. From every section of this great country; from students grown gray in study of the rights of mankind; from political and social economists, whose utterances have thrown light into dark places; from labor's recognized officers in the governments of States; from the executive chambers of giant trades organizations which have wrung deserved recognition from the great monopolies of the age; from the heads of great manufacturing establishments, who speak in the light of bitter experience, written perhaps in the light of the blaze caused by the torch of the misguided incendiary; from the pulpit; from the editorial sanctum; from the mine, the mill, and the workshop come up the answer in no uncertain tones, "Arbitration is the missing coupling between labor and capital."

General W. H. Powell, president of the great works of the Western Nail Company at Belleville, Ill., after a recital of the bitter controversy which raged between his company and their workmen, says:

I hold that the true and real interests of capital and labor are identical and inseparable. They are, however, the results consequent upon the ill-advised counsels of designing men, denominated leaders, who are influenced by passion and prejudice, regardless of the real interests of the masses of the laboring classes, protecting the highest paid labor, and controlling the lowest paid labor by intimidation and defamation, regardless of consequent results. Arbitration is in my opinion the necessary link between capital and labor. The refusal of the organization, known as the United Nailers, to submit the wage question to arbitration last April, as was the custom of the Amalgamated Association of the Iron and Steel Workers of the United States, from which the United Nailers of America seceded last spring, is the sole cause of the long, bitter contest between the manufacturers and their workmen. Legislative arbitration will not obviate strikes and their consequent evils. There is no power in the State, church, or societies, no police or military capable of compelling or enforcing compulsory practical arbitration. Capital and labor have ever existed in their separate, independent spheres and interests, and ever will to the end of time. Their union alone makes their combined interests one and inseparable. Amicable arbitration between capital and labor is the only true remedy.

Mr. Samuel Laughlin, president of the Junction Iron Company of Wheeling, W. Va., gives his sentiments on this absorbing question after a long and disastrous struggle with his employés. He says:

The experience of myself for six months in our mills at Mingo and Martin's Ferry, both nail-mills, employing a large number—over 1,000—of intelligent operatives and men whom I personally highly esteem, has been painful to myself and brother, whose death was produced by the incidents of the strike, now lasting over seven months. I have been a quiet observer of the inception and progress of this difficulty and have been an unwilling participant in it. I do not feel that strikes or lockouts are a necessary feature of the wage system, but do believe arbitration the proper method for the settlement of the differences which arise between the employers and those employed. * * * While I believe the scale presented to the nailers by the manufacturers mainly correct and demanded by the condition of trade and surrounding competition, yet it made demands which could only have been harmonized with conflicting views had both parties met in conference. The nailers of our locality are intelligent men as a class and could readily see the requirements of the day, that any arbitrary scale placing us at a disadvantage with other manufacturers could only be to their ultimate disadvantage. Hence I feel that arbitration is not only a wise method, but in fact the only way to harmonize differences arising in reaching an equitable basis of the wage question, although I am not prepared to suggest the method most desired.

Listen to the thoughtful utterances of P. H. Donnelly, esq., general secretary of the Illinois Miners' Protective Association:

I look upon the acceptance of the principle of arbitration for settling disputes and as a preventive against their occurring by the laboring men of thought and the employers disposed to do what is fair by their employés as being a hopeful sign in this conflict between labor and capital—such meetings as the one just held in Pittsburgh, Pa., between the national executive board of our organization and representatives of a large number of coal mining and shipping companies to discuss their proper relationship, aiming to decide upon what should be a fair price for coal in the market and a fair price for the labor engaged in its production, all trying to be controlled by the great principle of reason, which is arbitration. Without reason there is no arbitration, and arbitration means a stop to those prolonged and ruinous struggles between employers and employés, a shaking of hands across the bloody chasm. Arbitration proper is the missing link between capital and labor. With that principle firmly established we may hope for a more satisfactory and equitable division of the profits arising from industrial enterprises.

Daniel McLaughlin, president of the Miners' State Protective Association of Illinois reflects the views of his organization when he says:

A board of arbitration, properly constituted of honest, intelligent men, with power to examine the books of any establishment where a dispute existed, to ascertain the legal amount of money invested (no watered stock to be taken into consideration) and the net earnings of the establishment, with the power to enforce its decision, would in my judgment prevent many great strikes and lockouts and bring more security to capital and a better remuneration to the laborer.

A. H. Danforth, esq., vice-president and general manager of the Colorado Coal and Iron Company, South Pueblo, Colo., lifts his voice in behalf of a trial of the arbitration system, and declares that—

Arbitration is not a panacea to cure the ills of labor, but it represents the next stage of human development in advance of strikes. In the Middle Ages might was right, and every dispute was settled by a resort to force. This was the age of feudalism. Following that came the establishment of courts of justice for the settlement of disputes, and the judge and lawyer took the place of the baron and soldier in the settlement of private differences. Strikes and lockouts are the characteristics of the feudal age of labor and capital, and arbitration will be the characteristic of the age of law.

Professor S. Waterhouse, of Washington University, of St. Louis, a profound scholar and advanced thinker, says, with much force:

An equitable adjustment of the relations of capital and labor is a problem whose solution demands the gravest thought of statesmen and political economists. The settlement of differences between manufacturers and workmen by means of strikes is a rude and costly process. It has been stated that the aggregate loss inflicted upon Great Britain since 1870 by these violent interruptions of productive industry is more than $200,000,000. Every great manufacturing nation loses millions annually by the misunderstandings that arise between employers and their workmen. The waste of property by civil strife between labor and capital is almost equal to the havoc of a foreign war. The thrift of the working classes and the well-being of society imperatively require the prevention of this enormous loss. A reconciliation of the conflicting interests of manufacturers and their operatives is the difficult task which now challenges the attention of practical thinkers. The history of international dissensions encourages the belief that there is a way of pacifying industrial disagreements. In former ages a recourse to war was the sole means of settling royal disputes. The sword was the universal umpire of contested rights.

Through the slow lapse of centuries the progress of civilization and enlightened humanity has gradually introduced more reasonable methods of composing national quarrels, and now governments, taught by the desolation and miseries of war, have learned to submit their claims to peaceful arbitration. Many a difficulty which in an earlier age would have been decided by a resort to battle, has in modern times been settled by the bloodless arts of diplomacy. If the discords of alien governments, embittered by jealousies and wrongs, can be harmonized by amicable reference, assuredly mere business differences between members of the same community ought to be susceptible of peaceful adjustment. The fact that such differences have often been reconciled by arbitration proves the feasibility of the plan and strongly recommends its general adoption. It is quite improbable that wars and strikes will ever be wholly prevented by any device of man, but their frequency will be greatly reduced by the growing intelligence of the civilized races and by a clearer recognition of human rights.

Professor E. J. James, of the Wharton School of Finance and Economy, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Pa., writes:

In arbitration, as a means of immediate relief and of permanent advantage in various ways, I am a thorough believer. I think it should be recognized in law by providing for the establishment of boards of arbiters, whose decisions should have a binding force. No good can come from our persistently closing our eyes to patent facts of our social life. Our laws and lawmakers at present proceed on the supposition of a state of perfect freedom on the part of every individual laborer and employer, whereas, as a matter of fact, they are both usually (and the exceptions are becoming fewer every day) members of some organization or other, which practically dictates to each what he must do or leave undone. These organizations are facts with which we have to reckon, and as they are powerful for mischief, they may also become powerful for good under a proper system of public control. Arbitration has the great advantage of subjecting the acts of the parties to it to the efficient and powerful control of an energetic public opinion. It recognizes, indirectly, what is too often overlooked, that the interests at stake are not merely those of the laborer and the employer, but also those of the community at large. The latter has such a great stake in the contest that it can not afford to stand idly by and permit the former to disturb society to its foundations and destroy in their struggle the very conditions of sound economic progress.

That distinguished divine, Rev. R. Heber Newton, of New York city, adds his testimony when he says:

Arbitration is proving in the economic strife what it is in the political strife. The fact that nations are now ready, under the force of public opinion and by the very burden which war imposes, to pause a moment before committing themselves to actual conflict and talk the matter over, is itself a preventive of war in many instances. It gives time for passion to cool and judgment and conscience to assert themselves. Arbitration is proving to be the missing coupling between capital and labor in England and in France—very notably in the latter case in the semi-legal courts known as the conseil des prudhommes.

Robert Bennett, master-workman of the Illinois State Assembly Knights of Labor, says:

Arbitration is a proper means to adopt for the settlement of disputes and grievances between employer and employés.

Hon. Oscar Kochtitzky, commissioner of labor of my own State [Missouri], a gentleman for whose calm judgment I have the highest regard, might well have had the pending bill before him when he wrote:

Strikes and lockouts are in nearly every case the result of an aggravation of ill-feeling, brought on by the existence of a real or imaginary difference existing between employer and employé, which difference in most instances could and would have been settled satisfactorily to both sides had arbitration been resorted to as soon as it was known that a serious difference between employer and employé existed, and before the breach between them began to widen and form itself into an aggravated and resentful condition. A board of arbitration, composed of persons capable to judge clearly between right and wrong, possessing in every respect the confidence of the community, and who are not directly interested in the dispute to be settled, would in nearly every case present a plan of settlement acceptable to both parties. Any proposition made by a board so composed would be supported by the moral force of public opinion, and the refusal by either party to the dispute to accept the plan of settlement proposed could only be fatal to the interests of the party so refusing.

The Hon. E. R. Hutchins, commissioner of labor statistics of Iowa, in replying to the question direct, "Is arbitration the necessary coupling between labor and capital?" writes:

I believe it is. Believing it to be, I have urged, in my report, the enactment of a law embodying its principles. Wherever it is tried honestly it is successful. This is true in this and in the old countries. But it must be honest. It must be entered into with sincerity on the part of both sides, and its results must be as binding as any law upon a statute-book. Such a policy must eventually succeed, for at its very foundation is the recognition of mutual rights. This is getting very near the highest Divine command, "Love thy neighbor as thyself." What is needed is for reason to assert itself. When it shall hold sway (and it will not take long in honest arbitration to enthrone it), then employer and employé will learn that their interests are not antagonistic, but thoroughly reciprocal.

Professor J. B. Clark, of Smith College, Northampton, Mass., whose contributions to the literature of social economy are of the very highest type, tersely says:

Arbitration is in itself an appeal to equity and a departure from the competitive principle. The competition which is the basis of the orthodox political economy is already a thing of the past in the sphere of wage adjustments. It has been visited by combinations on both sides. True competition gave a rude approximation to justice in assigning the rewards of industry. The wreck of a competitive system, with the true competition left out, approaches more and more to the ignoble condition from which civilization emerged. It needs powerful agencies for an appeal to justice in assigning the rewards of industry. That can be most easily and immediately made by arbitration.

In Fred. Swarwood I find one of those toilers who, while working at his bench in a Western city, looks with a calm and contemplative eye upon the condition of his fellow-workmen, and with a graphic pen declares that:

In the principle of arbitration is unified the interests of both parties, and to my mind is a doctrine in the gospel of industry worthy of being the eleventh commandment. It recognizes no class, hate, or ostracism. It assumes and acts on the idea that on the floor of justice the hob-nail boot and the golden slipper are on a common level, and is a phase of the evolution that by education, liberty, and the higher ambitions, produces scholars and thinkers at the forge and the work-bench—a new strata in civilization, under which the slave and his master will yet be but a dead bone and a fossil. It brings reason to the adjustment of difficulties, where our grandfathers brought a firebrand and a brickbat, and to-day there is no question even in national politics so vital in its import or so grand in its issue as this self-same idea of arbitration. It is at the causes of strikes and lockouts as an ax at the root of a tree and a knife at a cancer. Of its adoption there is no doubt, though its details and methods may be matters of experience and time. It has its enemies, as had the act of emancipation. It hurts the business prospects of the demagogue and takes away the tin horn with which he called his hounds and hunted the game, and it removes the last rivet in the armor of feudalism, by which the pride of a Plantagenet keeps the "common herd" of mankind in distance and disdain. The plaster covers the sore.

Professor Henry C. Adams, lecturer on political economy in the University of Michigan and Cornell University, while denying that arbitration is the "missing coupling-link between labor and capital," goes so far as to say that—should strive. Its establishment is the first step toward the overthrow of the wages system. Workingmen are right in demanding it; employers also, if they judge wholly from the standpoint of their personal interests, are logical and clear-headed in opposing it.

It is the thing for which at the present time it is practical that workingmen

N. O. Nelson, of Saint Louis, the head of a great manufacturing company, who has ever striven to improve the condition of his workmen and the first employer to introduce profit-sharing in Saint Louis, in a long letter advocating that system, says: "Arbitration is not a perfect, but it is the most available remedy in existing trouble."

By to-day's mail I received a communication from Hugh T. McMurtry, of Saint Louis, announcing that Saint Louis Typographical Union No. 8 requests the passage of Congressional enactments that will tend to avert the necessity of strikes and provide for the arbitration of such differences as may arise between employers and employés.

John C. Sarsfield, of New York, an eminent writer on social and political economy, says:

Arbitration is a missing link. The chain is broken in so many places that it can not repair all the fractures. It is an advance from the crudeness of the strike, with its privation and waste, up to a rational means of settlement of disputes between employer and employé. It is the primary step in the evolution of the labor question.

Joel B. McCamant, chief of the bureau of industrial statistics, State of Pennsylvania, disposes of the question with characteristic directness when he says:

Arbitration in my opinion is the only reasonable "coupling between labor and capital."

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, these are but a few of the utterances of men whose words carry with them the weight of practical knowledge of the question at issue, taught them in some instances in the bitter school of experience. I might prolong the quotations for days if I thought it necessary. I will take the liberty later in the session to publish in the RECORD additional testimony as to the effectiveness and desirability of voluntary arbitration.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to offer in this connection for the information of the House as a result of the efforts at arbitration in England a statement of Mr. Edward Trowe, who is the secretary of the conciliation and arbitration board of the manufactured iron trade in the north of England. He explains the principles on which the board of conciliation and arbitration act in England. He says:

The principles upon which the board is conducted are equal representation for both employers and employés, and the operative representative is in all cases treated with courtesy and recognized as being authorized to treat for the workmen and inquire into any and all matters that may arise in the works he represents, if such matter affects the interest of the workmen. Trades unions were the result of oppression on the part of the employer, whose acts compelled men to organize in self-defense, and after their formation we had many very severe conflicts between capital and labor, in many cases such conflicts inflicting misery and suffering on thousands of helpless wives and children and ruin upon employers. The result of these labor wars in no case proved who was in the right, but ending in victory for the strongest, left the trade demoralized and paralyzed, and created hatred in the hearts of the defeated, who accepted defeat with a stubborn determination at the first opportunity of taking their full revenge.

Arbitration was the result of the efforts of the late Mr. J. Kane and other trade-union leaders, who saw the evil effects upon the trade and trading community of the barbarous system of strikes and lockouts, and in 1869 delegates representing the workmen in the north of England, acting under the advice of Mr. Kane, and employers of the district, acting under the advice of Mr. D. Dale, met together and decided to establish a board of conciliation and arbitration at which both parties could meet together, discuss freely and fully every question, bring the light of reason to bear upon all and every point of difference that may arise and create a feeling of confidence between employers and employés. From 1869 up to the present the board then established has continued to exist, and during the whole period it has been a boon and a blessing to both employers, employés, and the whole district.

In prosperous or inflated times it has prevented men from taking undue advantage and insures the continuance of work in depressed times; it has prevented unjust employers from taking undue advantage of workmen and compelled them to prove by facts before an independent arbitrator the justice of their demands, and I have no hesitation in stating that the benefit and success of the system of conciliation and arbitration for settling disputes over the old and barbarous system of strikes and lockouts, as proved by the history of the North of England board, fully establishes the utility and adaptability of the system, and no parallel can be found in the history of trade at any period previous to 1869 where disputes have been settled so advantageously, or such good feeling has existed between employers and employés.

The English statute which was the subject of discussion yesterday in the House was passed in the fifth year of the reign of George IV, in 1824, and I have the authority, in his published reports, of our Commissioner of Labor, Carroll D. Wright, and Hon. D. J. Ryan, of Ohio, who has published an excellent book on the subject of arbitration, to say that that and all other compulsory arbitration laws were absolutely dead letters, complete failures. They have never been enforced. Every compulsory law that has ever been placed upon the statute-books of any country has proven a failure. The judgment of to-day, as illustrated in this country, proves that you can only secure the result sought to be secured by conciliation, by bringing together the conflicting interests and by harmonizing them.

In France, under the operation of that system, they have grown since 1803 until the last report in 1874 to one hundred and twelve councils, and had settled twenty-six thousand eight hundred disputes. The councils now number upward of one hundred and fifty.

Now, in the North of England where, since 1869, they have had a voluntary system of conciliation and of arbitration between the iron-masters and workers, strikes are unknown. Prior to that period that section of England witnessed the scenes that have been reproduced in Belgium in the last few weeks, accompanied by riots and bloodshed, a resort to force and shotguns as a method of determining human rights.

Reason in every instance has proven to be sufficiently powerful to bring about a settlement, and there is not a member on this floor when he stops to reflect upon the effect of public opinion but knows that it is powerful enough in this connection. In my own section of the country workmen during the past two weeks by an absolute silent protest have succeeded in paralyzing the commerce of the nation. Railroad corporations controlling 8,000 miles of railroad were unable to move a wheel. To-day the sentiment of the workingmen throughout this land, which is rising like the sound of the waves against a rock-ribbed shore, or as the sound of the storm when forests are rended, reaches this House, and tells you that when the workingmen have secured an honest verdict and your general corporations will not live up to it, public opinion will find a way to compel them to do so. That will meet the difficulty. Public opinion in the past has justified heroic remedies, and it will again do so whenever you appeal to intelligence and honesty, to right and manhood and a recognition of the rights of the poorest and the humblest citizen in the land. When the time comes that honest public opinion can not enforce it, the people will find a remedy, and very shortly.

I believe, sir, that the time has now arrived for closing the general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for general debate upon this bill has expired. The bill will now be considered under the five-minute rule by sections for amendment and debate.

The Clerk will report the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever differences or controversies arise between common carriers engaged in the transportation of property or passengers, whether said common carriers be private persons or corporations, between two or more States of the United States, or within the Territories of the United States, or within the District of Columbia, and the employés of said common carriers, which differences or controversies may hinder, impede, obstruct, interrupt, or affect such transportation of property or passengers, or when such employés, or any of them, allege that he or they have been treated unjustly or oppressively, either as to wages, hours of labor, or otherwise, by such common carrier, if, upon the written proposition of either party to the controversy to submit their differences to arbitration, the other party shall accept the proposition, then and in such event the common carrier is hereby authorized to select and appoint one person, and such employé or employés, as the case may be, to select and appoint another person, and the two persons thus selected and appointed to select a third person, all three of whom shall be citizens of the United States and wholly impartial and disinterested in respect to such differences or controversies; and the three persons thus selected and appointed shall be, and they are hereby, created and constituted a board of arbitration, with the duties, powers, and privileges hereinafter set forth.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "States," in line 7, the words "between a Territory or State," and strike out the word "or" where it occurs first in line 7.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think if the chairman of the committee will examine this amendment he will accept it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It simply perfects the bill.

Mr. CANNON. It simply perfects the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I can not hope in five minutes to discuss this bill with satisfaction to the House or myself. I shall vote for the bill for reasons so well assigned by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] yesterday and by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] to-day.

Mr. Chairman, the census returns of 1880 show in round numbers two hundred and thirty-six thousand railway employés other than clerks. At this time no doubt they number over three hundred thousand. There is in operation in the United States 125,000 miles of railway. The railways operated by the employés carry the mails, the passengers, and the products for exchange for sixty millions of people. If the railways refuse to perform their functions there is power to forfeit their charters—power in the public to make such provision as will insure the performance of the functions for which they were created. If any person illegally obstructs the railway in the performance of its functions there is under the law a remedy to the railway and to the public.

There has been, and is now, for that matter, a dispute between the managers of railways and the employés as to the compensation such employés should receive, hours of labor, &c. These differences frequently lead to strikes or cessation of work upon the part of the employés. On the discharge of employés by the companies, not infrequently resulting in a discontinuance of traffic by the railways and the great injury of the business of sixty millions of people, the differences between the employer and employés are generally settled by argument or arbitration in the end, both parties generally yielding something; and whatever the result may be between these parties, if traffic upon the road ceases, the loss to the great public—the customer—is never made up. If possible such differences between employer and employé should be prevented by wise and equitable arrangement. This bill provides for the appointment of a tribunal—both parties assenting—with power to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, send for persons and papers, and summarily determine the differences submitted; all expenses of witnesses, arbitrators, &c., to be paid by the United States.

It is objected, first, that the proposed legislation is unconstitutional. This objection to my mind is not well taken, for the arbitration provided for only applies to differences arising touching interstate commerce.

Second. It is objected that there is no way provided in the bill by which the award can be enforced, and that without the proposed legislation differences are now settled by arbitration.

In reply I repeat the bill creates a legal tribunal by the consent of the parties, consisting of three arbitrators, having full power of investigation and inquiry, to compel the attendance of witnesses and production of papers, a power that can not be exercised without this or similar legislation, and as the expenses are borne by the United States, it is believed that where differences exist both employer and employé will submit them, and, pending their investigation and decision, there will be no interruption of railway traffic, and when decided by such impartial tribunal that both the railway and employé will abide by the award. It has been asked, If they do not comply with the award what does the party lose which refuses? I answer, the party refusing meets the condemnation of that public opinion which, in the end, is founded in justice and is greater than railways or employés, courts or laws, and against which no case can stand.

Even now the operation of that public opinion is having much to do in the settlement of the railway troubles, much of which, I think, is due to the temperate circular of Mr. Powderly, recently issued.

Now, if a month ago such an arbitration as the one contemplated by this bill had been submitted, and in the mean time the operation of the railways had been continued, how infinitely better it would have been for the employer and employé and the public. In the future, when differences arise, I believe this bill, if enacted, will tend to accomplish just that thing. But suppose we are mistaken, the legislation can do no harm; so there is much to gain and nothing to lose by its enactment. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who oppose this bill do not propose to amend it or offer a substitute for it. Most of them do not believe in any legislation upon the subject. I would gladly vote for any legislation that can be sustained and is practical if proposed; but I venture the assertion that in this, as in all other situations arising from the constant changes in our economic condition, we must feel our way as necessity may require, and if it should turn out that additional legislation is necessary, the wisdom and patriotism of the people will demand and secure it.

One thing is certain, some way will be found by which differences arising between the railways and employés will be equitably adjusted without paralyzing the business of sixty millions of people. I was much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], who called our attention to the fact that the railway commission in Massachusetts has no power whatever to enforce its awards, yet in every instance its awards have been complied with by all parties; truly a striking illustration of the power of public opinion sustaining the award of an intelligent unbiased commission.

Sir, I have tried to frame amendments to this bill, keeping within the Constitution, that are practical, for the enforcement of awards, and with my limited experience have been unable to do so, and doubt if at this time any one can frame such amendments.

Mr. Speaker, I have been much amused at the different views of gentlemen as to the cause of labor troubles in the country. Some gentlemen believe all our troubles arise from a contracted currency, others from an expanded currency, others find a panacea in an approach to free trade. I am constantly reminded of that old story of the doctor who always threw his patient into fits and then cured the fits. One thing at a time, gentlemen. The object now is to give such assistance as we properly can by enacting legislation that will assist in equitably settling differences between railways and employés, and after this is disposed of we can consider other matters.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri can not accept the amendment; it has to be voted on. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] is recognized.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], the champion of labor on this floor, said of this bill—

> I desire to say that I shall vote for this bill; and as that is my purpose, I want to say in advance to the workingmen of the country that it is a trick upon their credulity and a fraud.

Since I have seen those words printed in the RECORD I have been trying to think what that gentleman, so well posted and so careful as to the interests of laboring men, could have meant. And I think I see in this thing not a bill to protect labor, but a bill to prevent strikes in the interest of the corporations and at the expense of the United States. Of course Gould and everybody else owning railroads may say, "We are ready at any time to arbitrate with you at the expense of the Government and with nothing to come of it except to file the award." They may think they will then have public opinion on their side, and that those who undertook before to force them into terms, and even succeeded in forcing them to do what they thought was right by strikes, must then yield to public opinion because they will have arbitrated under this "fraud and trick."

Mr. Chairman, no good can come of fraud or trickery. Every honest man who believes that this is either the one or the other ought to vote against the bill. Every honest man who believes it is dangerous to start in on this line ought to vote against this bill. Who are the most powerful here to-day, capital or labor? Perhaps labor is now. Who may be most powerful in the next Congress or the next? Whenever Congress starts once on the line of taking charge of these matters Congress may decide to go against labor instead of against the corporations. The real friend of labor is the man who is careful lest he be drawing the sword of the Government to strike down the right of combination against these corporations by substituting what may grow into a compulsory proceeding.

Whether this bill is good or bad, believing that it is unconstitutional, I must vote against it. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] says it is not a hasty measure. He says he has been gathering expressions of opinions of many men, expressions from which he has been reading common platitudes coming from his constituency and other constituencies that he felt like complimenting, and he says that after maturing the measure and reading all these things this is the result. The measure which the gentleman matured and introduced on the day before yesterday——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. On Monday.

Mr. HAMMOND. On Monday—was a bill for compulsory arbitration, and it was only when the committee took charge of it it was found that none but one man on the committee would advocate such a thing. That shows that the gentleman started out wrong by his own confession. It shows this whole thing is hasty. It is proposed that we, who take days and weeks to consider whether we will pay a man $500 or a thousand dollars, shall now, in hot haste, without thought, crystallize in statute form something that nobody says is good and many people say is a mere trick to get rid of the question.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLEMENTS. If recognized I yield my time to my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate upon this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Speaker, I am not willing that what I had to say upon the constitutionality of this bill should rest upon my simple declaration as a lawyer. While I was out of the House this morning I understand that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] discussed that question at large. I do not know what he said, and therefore can not specifically reply thereto, but I desire to call attention to a leading case in the Supreme Court of the United States, the case of the propeller Genesee Chief and others against Fitz-Hugh, decided in 1851—the great case which made our northern lakes seas and declared all the navigable waters of this country under the jurisdiction of the Congress. There was a discussion as to whether trades made on steamboats could be made the subject-matter of controversy in United States courts by Congress because they were made about matters affecting interstate commerce. The Supreme Court decided in these words:

> Nor can the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States be made to depend on regulations of commerce. They are entirely distinct things, having no necessary connection with one another, and are conferred in the Constitution by separate and distinct grants. The extent of the judicial power is carefully defined and limited, and Congress can not enlarge it to suit even the wants of commerce, nor for the more convenient execution of commercial regulations; and the limits fixed by the Constitution to the judicial authority of the courts of the United States would form an insuperable objection to this law if its validity depended upon the commercial power.

Again, in another paragraph which I shall quote, they declare that the dogma that gives the judicial power a standing on the commerce clause would authorize Congress to carry every such thing into admiralty jurisdiction, and, as to them, thus abolish trial by jury, and put the rights of every citizen, when his contract grew out of any interstate transportation, at the dictation of one man, the judge in such court.

The court there held this language, namely:

> This power is as extensive upon land as upon water. The Constitution makes no distinction in that respect. And if the admiralty jurisdiction, in matters of contract and tort, which the courts of the United States may lawfully exercise on the high seas, can be extended to the lakes under the power to regulate commerce, it can with the same propriety and upon the same construction, be extended to contracts and torts on land when the commerce is between different States. And it may embrace also the vehicles and persons engaged in carrying it on. It would be in the power of Congress to confer admiralty jurisdiction upon its courts over the cars engaged in transporting passengers or merchandise from one State to another, and over the persons engaged in conducting them, and deny to the parties the trial by jury.
> Now, the judicial power in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction has never been supposed to extend to contracts made on land and to be executed on land. But if the power of regulating commerce can be made the foundation of jurisdiction in its courts, and a new and extended admiralty jurisdiction beyond its heretofore known and admitted limits may be created on water under that authority, the same reason would justify the same exercise of power on land.

From that it is clear that such a dogma is destructive of the wise provisions of the Constitution. When that is true, even could I see some seeming good to come to laboring men from this bill, I would be compelled to vote against it, because those laborers and all of us have a higher interest in preserving the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I could not if I had time make more forcible by elaboration the view which I present. But, because I have not the time, I fail to state strong and pertinent objections to this miserable sham sought to be palmed off as law.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the word "sham" is very important, and I hope it will not be stricken out.

Mr. HAMMOND. I used it for your benefit.

Availing myself of the general permission to print as to this bill, I cite the sixth section of the bill proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] to make good my assertion about its compulsory character. It is:

SEC. 6 That whenever any such board of arbitrators has been organized and has entered upon the discharge of its duties as herein provided, it shall be unlawful for such servant or employé, servants or employés, to interfere in any way to hinder, impede, interrupt, or in any manner to injuriously affect the commerce or business of the common carrier who is a party to such arbitration; and if it come to the notice of such board of arbitrators that the commerce or business of such common carrier, during the pendency of such arbitration, is so hindered, impeded, interrupted, or injuriously affected by the unlawful acts of any person or persons whomsoever, then and in that event it shall be the duty of such board of arbitrators to forthwith report the same in writing to the judge of the district or Territorial court of the United States whose clerk would be required to record the award that might be rendered by such board of arbitrators; and thereupon it shall be the duty of said judge, and he is hereby fully empowered, to interfere and to use and employ his power and authority as judge of said court to prevent such hindering, impeding, interrupting, or injury to the commerce or business of said common carrier during the pendency of such arbitration in like manner as if such arbitration was pending on the equity side of said court.

And the fourth section of the intended substitute of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] is in these words:

SEC. 4. That when the said findings and decisions of the said board of commissioners shall be so reviewed by the said district or circuit judge, the same shall be entered upon the records of said court in the nature of a judicial decree, which shall be served upon the party or parties concerning whom said decree shall be made, requiring such party or parties to do and perform certain act or acts, if any, as measures of just and fair arbitration; and if, upon such reasonable notice as the court may direct, the terms of said decree shall be disobeyed, set at naught, and rendered inoperative by said party or parties, the same shall be held to be a contempt of court, to be punished by fine and imprisonment, either or both, in such amount or for such term as the court may see fit; and the usual process shall issue from said court to enforce its orders in this behalf.

True, these compulsory clauses are not in the bill reported to the House, nor will this House adopt them. But may they not be put in by another Congress if the basis for such legislation be now made?

To avoid the force of the constitutional point some now say that these arbitrators are not a tribunal. The preamble to the bill of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] was in these words:

Whereas by the Constitution of the United States Congress is invested with full power and authority to provide for the general welfare of the people of the United States; to regulate commerce among the several States; to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court of the United States; and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers: Therefore.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] in his speech yesterday called it a court. His language was:

This bill provides for an arbitration, in each dispute each side selecting a disinterested person, those two selecting a third, and the three arbitrators are sworn to faithfully and impartially determine the questions at issue; they are created a court, with full powers to send for persons and papers, examine witnesses under oath to obtain the fullest information, and announce their verdict, trusting to the power of public opinion for the enforcement of the award.

What but a court can it be which is described by the bill in these words, namely:

SEC. 2. That the board of arbitration provided for in the first section of this act shall possess all the powers and authority in respect to administering oaths, subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance, preserving order during the sittings of the board, punishing for contempt, and requiring the production of papers and writings, and all other powers and privileges, in their nature applicable, now possessed and belonging to United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States.

If deemed pertinent to the controversy, may not that tribunal compel the production of the books and papers of a transportation company or of a lodge of Knights of Labor? Since speaking I have been furnished with the Philadelphia Times of this morning. It is a Democratic paper of large circulation and great influence, published in the very center of the great laboring population of Philadelphia. Its leader of this morning was so forcible that I adopt it as part of my remarks. This is the article:

A BILL THAT IS A FRAUD AND TRICK.

Judge KELLEY rightly characterized Mr. O'NEILL's arbitration bill as "a fraud," a "trick upon the credulity of American workingmen." Nevertheless he expressed his intention of voting for it. Claptrap measures of this kind can always get plenty of votes, even at a session when it is impossible to secure consideration for any serious legislation. Members vote for them because they are "harmless," and opposition might be misunderstood.

There is a great deal of mischief done by "harmless" legislation. In truth, there can be no such thing. Legislation that is not sound and right and useful is harmful. Every act that is unnecessary or meddlesome or impotent, or that promises what it can not perform, is misleading and obstructive, a positive injury to the commonwealth. No social problems are ever solved by humbug. They are only complicated.

Mr. O'NEILL's bill, which obtained so much consideration in the House of Representatives yesterday, is at best a shallow pretense. The subject with which it professes to deal lies wholly without the jurisdiction of Congress, and while the bill apparently gives extraordinary authority to boards of arbitration, in reality it would not promote "the speedy settlement of controversies" in the smallest degree. The bill recites at great length that when differences or controversies arise between "common carriers" and their employés, and either party proposes to submit their differences to arbitration and the other party accepts the proposition, they are "hereby authorized" to select and appoint fit persons as arbitrators. What is the need or use of this? Does any one suppose that Mr. Gould and Mr. Powderly or Mr. Hoxie and Mr. Irons have been waiting for the authority of Congress to submit their differences to arbitration, or that they would agree any more readily with such authority than without? There is no compulsion in the act, because there can be none. It is simply "may." But they "may" do all this as it is, and where Congress has no power it is worse than useless for it to interfere.

This is not the end of Mr. O'NEILL's plan. Assuming that the arbitration be agreed to and the board appointed in the manner described, it is then proposed to give to the arbitrators the powers of United States commissioners as regards the examination of witnesses and other proceedings, and also to give them the compensation of United States commissioners, with allowance for clerks, stenographers, witness fees, and so on. Their findings and awards, together with the testimony taken, are to be filed with the Commissioner of Labor of the United States, "who shall make such award public," but the bill provides no means of enforcing the award, for the sufficient reason that Congress has no such power. The whole arrangement is purely voluntary, and the only effect that the act can have is to create an indefinite number of salaried places, to be called into existence by any person that may choose to assert a grievance and to be continued at will at the expense of the United States.

It will be observed that the act applies to all manner of common carriers operating between two States, "whether private persons or corporations," which would include a stage-coach line or a ferry-boat as well as a railroad, and all that is necessary to bring it into operation is that the common carrier's employés, "or any of them, shall allege that he or they have been treated unjustly or oppressively." Under this pleasant scheme the owner of a Delaware ferry-boat and one of his deck-hands could get up a controversy, resolve themselves, with a mutual friend, into a board of arbitration, and proceed to draw the salary of United States commissioners as long as they could find witnesses to examine at the public expense. The O'Neill bill opens up possibilities in the way of permanent and lucrative employment as arbitrators beside which the salaried positions in labor lodges are insignificant.

This is the only way in which the bill can have any results at all. There is no warrant in the Constitution for any such method of creating salaried offices, and there might be difficulty in getting the money out of the Treasury, but the plan is no less mischievous because it would probably fail. It is clear that in any event this "harmless" bill has potentialities of positive as well as negative harm which should be enough to condemn it even if it were not condemned on the ground of its utter inadequacy to meet its professed purpose—"to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences." If arbitration is ever to become a positive and practical thing, meddling politicians must keep their hands off.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the first section by striking out from the words "or when," in the eleventh line, down to and including the word "carrier," in the fourteenth line.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending to which this can not be an amendment, and therefore the Chair will first put the question upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. CANNON, as follows:

In the seventh line, after the word "States," insert "between a Territory and State;" and in the same line strike out the word "or" where it first occurs, so that the provision will read, "between two or more States of the United States; between a Territory and State, within the Territories of the United States, or in the District of Columbia," &c.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, perhaps I should endeavor to heal the feelings I wounded yesterday in the precipitancy of my speech when I supposed this bill was to be rushed through by unanimous consent, as it had been taken up to the exclusion of all business. I did not mean that the gentlemen on that committee had deliberately perpetrated a fraud or a trick. Why, sir, I had read this bill, and I knew that the gentlemen who could submit it to the workingmen of this country as a provision for "the speedy settlement of controversies" between great railroad companies and their employés were quite too innocent to deliberately perpetrate a fraud or a trick upon the public. I spoke rather objectively. [Laughter.] I was addressing the great mass of workingmen as to what would be the result of the innocence of these gentlemen.

Here is a bill proposing to enable people in controversy to do, under the sanction of Congress and at the cost of the Government, what they were doing at that time; what the great master-workman of the combined workingmen of the United States had appealed to his side to do under penalty of his withdrawal from connection with them. Mr. Powderly, the grand master-workman of the Knights of Labor, has done more to advance arbitration than all the frothy eloquence that I and my associates on this floor have uttered both yesterday and to-day. That masterly paper of his has been considered by the heads of all the great combinations of capital that are employing great masses of labor, and they have said to themselves, "If this is the spirit of the workingmen, we must regard it."

This bill proposes to do, without penal sanction, what has been going on day after day in every part of the country in the concession of increased pay by employers, in the concession of shorter hours to the overwrought conductors and drivers and stablemen employed by the street-car companies. In this view I was led to remark that the bill comes in as a trick and a fraud. These are terms which I have been in the habit of using since 1832, when, though a mere boy, I was chosen by my shopmates, who were adults, to express their opinions, because as a mere boy I had impudence to speak when men as able as myself shrank from doing so. From that time to the present (we were then advocating the ten-hour system) I have been accustomed to denounce in my own State measures of legislation like this, promising all things to the ear, but without the means of enforcement—laws, for instance, limiting the age at which children may be employed, but imposing no penalty on the employer who takes in children who are years below the legal age or on the parent who lets them go; laws requiring children under a certain age to be placed in school for a portion of the year, and employed, at any rate, not more than half the time in a factory, but providing no means of enforcing the prohibition. During these fifty-four years I have seen so many deliberate frauds and tricks perpetrated upon the masses of workingmen that I incontinently used yesterday the familiar words for which I now apologize to the innocent members of that committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate on the pending section and amendments thereto.

Mr. DIBBLE. Before the committee rises I ask unanimous consent that all members desiring to propose amendments to this bill may have leave to print them in the RECORD.

Several MEMBERS. What good is that?

A MEMBER. We are going to pass the bill to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. It is suggested that, as the friends of the bill intend to press it to a vote to-night, the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina is unnecessary. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 142, noes 52.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed an act (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the temporary appointment of an acting assistant treasurer.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage by that body of the following bill; in which it requested the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. 2012) for the erection of a monument to Abraham Lincoln.

The message also announced the passage of the following joint resolutions:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 58) authorizing the printing of a naval report; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 115) providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John F. Slater.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of resuming the consideration of House bill 7479; and pending that motion I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the first section of the bill and amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move to amend so as to limit debate on the first section to forty-five minutes. There are a number of gentlemen who have amendments to propose and who desire to explain those amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Pending these motions, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 92, noes 91.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us have tellers.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 72 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and it was determined in the negative—yeas 64, nays 193, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—64.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll call,

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, moved by unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. DUNN. I object.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Before the Clerk announces the pairs, I wish to state that I am paired with Mr. TRIGG, but have voted on this proposition because by express arrangement this bill and all votes thereon were excepted from the pair.

The following pairs, until further notice, were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. OUTHWAITE with Mr. WEST.
Mr. BOYLE with Mr. HOUK.
Mr. CROXTON with Mr. BRADY.
Mr. SAYERS with Mr. GOFF.
Mr. DARGAN with Mr. STRUBLE.
Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. LEHLBACH.
Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.
Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. MILLIKEN.
Mr. MORGAN with Mr. HEPBURN.
Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. LOUTTIT.
And for this day as follows:
Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. LINDSLEY.
Mr. COBB with Mr. ROWELL.
Mr. PEEL with Mr. STRAIT.
Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. STEPHENSON.
Mr. WARD, of Indiana, with Mr. WAKEFIELD.
Mr. ROGERS with Mr. BUNNELL.
Mr. MILLS with Mr. ROCKWELL.
Mr. WARD, of Illinois, with Mr. MCKENNA.
Mr. CULBERSON with Mr. DAVENPORT.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the motion to close debate on the first section and all amendments thereto in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP in the chair). The question first recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina

[Mr. DIBBLE], and on the original motion and amendment the gentleman from Missouri demands the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. On that proposition I have the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The pending proposition is that when we return to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union debate on the first section and all amendments thereto shall be limited to one minute.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Does the gentleman refer to the debate upon the whole bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. No; but to the first section and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to amend that motion by striking out "one minute" and inserting "forty-five minutes," and on that question the gentleman from Missouri demands the previous question.

Mr. HAMMOND. Is it permissible to limit debate upon amendments which have never yet been proposed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that such has been the practice of the House under clause 6 of Rule XXIII.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and that is whether the motion of the gentleman from Missouri is not for the previous question limiting debate on the first section and proposed amendments; is not that the proposition before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. DIBBLE. And on the amendments which may be offered hereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands it applies to all amendments—to the first section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. REAGAN. I propose to debate the gentleman's demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not debatable.

Mr. REAGAN. If the Chair will hear me, I desire to present some considerations to show that it is debatable under the rules.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman can not interfere with the operation of the previous question unless where he rises to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Texas to rise to a point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I will waive it for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs then on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order, that debate can not be closed on an amendment which has not been proposed by a demand for the previous question, and I do so upon paragraph 3 of Rule XXVIII. It is as follows:

> 3. When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded, it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken thereon, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition, and the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

I have an additional ground. Upon ordering the previous question and upon the amendment made by the gentleman from South Carolina the bill has not been debated on either proposition, and under that clause of the rule I have a right to call for debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands a motion to limit debate is a proposition to be submitted to the House. When the previous question is ordered on that proposition, in the judgment of the present occupant of the chair, if there has been no previous debate, then under clause 3 of Rule XXVIII there may be thirty minutes of debate, fifteen minutes on each side.

The Chair understands that there have been rulings both ways as to the question whether the motion to limit debate is or is not debatable. There is nothing in the rule of the House expressly upon the subject either one way or the other; but as the previous question has been ordered upon that motion, and there has been no previous debate thereon, the present occupant of the chair is of the opinion that under the last paragraph of clause 3 of Rule XXVIII thirty minutes are allowed for debate.

Mr. REAGAN and Mr. SPRINGER addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order and gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. REAGAN. On yesterday I undertook in the discussion of this bill to address myself to the unconstitutionality of its provisions——

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that decision will not be allowed to pass as a precedent without further consideration, since it overturns all of the previous rulings and precedents of the House upon this point.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SPRINGER. Since this is a matter of too vital importance to allow it to pass unchallenged, I respectfully ask an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. By what authority does the gentleman from Illinois seek to deprive me of the floor and interfere with my right under the decision just made? I trust the gentleman will not interfere——

Mr. SPRINGER. I have taken an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HAMMOND. And I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do this because it is a matter of too much importance to pass without question, and I ask to be heard for a moment upon it. There should be no doubt about the rule, and it seems to me that it is a proposition that ought to be considered.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a question of order. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a question of order myself. I was recognized and on the floor, and I wish to know how it is that the gentleman from Illinois takes me from the floor after I have been recognized by the Chair and was proceeding to address the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois rose in his place, as the Chair saw, simultaneously, perhaps, with the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. REAGAN. I was on the floor when the Chair made its decision, and I addressed the Chair immediately at the conclusion of it, and before the gentleman from Illinois addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But inasmuch as the gentleman from Illinois proposes an appeal from the decision of the Chair, the Chair would not like to cut him off from that privilege. The course proposed by the gentleman from Texas would deprive the gentleman from Illinois of the right to appeal.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I will ask, Mr. Speaker, to be permitted to continue my remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. I shall, Mr. Speaker, ask to withdraw the appeal if I can be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. HAMMOND. I insist upon the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have the right, I believe, to withdraw the appeal, and if so I desire to exercise that right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has the right to withdraw the appeal, the Chair thinks.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I do this hoping that the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Texas, for whom I have the highest regard, will not suppose that I intended, in proposing to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, to interfere in any manner with the right of the gentleman from Texas to discuss the question which he proposed to discuss. But I took an appeal in the interest of good order in the House and for the purpose of testing the sense of the House upon the question.

I now withdraw the appeal, but respectfully protest against the ruling, and trust it will not be regarded as a precedent hereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The appeal is withdrawn.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Then I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday, in the course of my argument, I expressed the belief that the bill before the House was not warranted by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. To-day several gentlemen have insisted that, because I had advocated the bill which has been several times before the House to regulate interstate commerce, I was precluded from objecting to the constitutionality of this bill, and my position upon that subject and what I have said from time to time has been quoted upon me, especially by my young and distinguished colleague [Mr. CRAIN].

All I have to say in regard to that is, that what I have advocated is just what has been held by the courts of this country repeatedly to be a proper and true interpretation to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States in that regard. But there is no opinion of any court I suppose—and I venture the prediction that none will ever exist—in which the Supreme Court or any other court of high authority in this land will say that because men engaged in interstate commere, hire laborers on a particular part of their work, that therefore Congress has jurisdiction for settling the question as to the compensation of these laborers. If we can assume jurisdiction of this character, we can assume jurisdiction and try all questions whatever arising on contracts between men engaged in interstate commerce, and their grocers or merchants or anybody else with whom they trade or deal; and under this clause of the Constitution that would make a almost universal jurisdiction.

I insisted upon that provision of the Constitution for the regulation of interstate commerce because of its clear meaning and because of its repeated interpretation by the Supreme Court and by other courts. But I never dreamed of giving it an interpretation which would warrant the Congress in going down into the private contracts of parties, local labor contracts, or purchase of goods, groceries, horses, or any other possible dealing that can be had by people engaged in interstate commerce with other people. The very absurdity of the proposition must be palpable, as it seems to me, upon a mere statement of the facts.

The assumption that the proposed act is constitutional is met by the very face of the bill itself and by the admission by its friends that they do not dare to make its provisions compulsory. One more thing I want to say while I am up. It is assumed this is a measure in the interest of labor, and that those who oppose it are the enemies of people engaged in labor. Sir, it is of course possible I may be mistaken as to the facts and law of the case, but I am not mistaken in the fact that I am ready to do every constitutional thing, every reasonable and right thing, to protect labor against the power of monopolies and corporations. I think those who know me, either here or in my district or State, know what my position is on this subject. I do not propose to take a scare; I do not propose to be guilty of a moral cowardice which will cause us assume a jurisdiction by Congress not warranted by the Constitution, and which will thus furnish a dangerous precedent by the action of this House, advocated and sustained by men upon this floor who have opposed every measure to regulate interstate commerce. And why is it sustained by those men? Because they want the question of jurisdiction over the employés of railroads and men subject to their power determined in favor of Congress. For what reason? Let the friends of the laboring man now know, and I tell it to them so that they may know it and that the laboring men of the country may themselves know it in the future if they shall ever read what I am saying. When this bill is passed, assuming this jurisdiction, it is then in the power of Congress to make strikes, or refusal to work, or advising others not to work, or any other assumed misconduct of laborers on railroads a misdemeanor or a felony, as Congress may please to make it, and to place labor in the absolute power of the corporations, to be crushed down forever. My belief is that those who have opposed all measures to regulate interstate commerce desire this very jurisdiction, with the power, when a popular majority should consent to it, to subject the men engaged in strikes to the penalties of such acts as Congress may pass, in violation of the Constitution, but in pursuance of a precedent consented to by a Democratic House of Representatives, not because they believe it right, not because they believe it efficient, but because they are afraid to vote their convictions lest the laboring men of this country shall misunderstand them and vote against them. That is not a motive that should animate us. The laboring men themselves, if this bill should ever be passed and go to them, will curse the men that passed it, and will say, "We appealed to you for bread, and you gave us a stone."

I do not doubt if Jay Gould, the Vanderbilts, and the other railroad magnates were here and entitled to vote they would vote for this bill, because they would know it could do them no harm. If trouble should arise between them and their employés, and they should agree to an arbitration, and each select his arbitrator under this bill, is there a member of this House verdant enough to believe the railroad companies would ever consent to the selection of the third man unless they had first made sure he was their man? And there is no power provided in this bill to compel the selection of the umpire or to secure his selection otherwise than by the other two arbitrators. I have no belief there ever would be an arbitration under this proposed act unless the railroads were assured in advance the decision would be in their favor. But what would make this bill specially acceptable is the fact that it assumes jurisdiction for Congress to pass laws which will control the laborers of the railroad corporations. If we once consent to the exercise of this power, Congress may then pass such laws as will make all strikes or labor troubles misdemeanors or felonies, triable in the Federal courts, where poor men can not litigate their rights, and where they will find themselves hopelessly in the power of the railroad corporations.

Mr. DUNN. Let me remind the gentleman just there that during the telegraph strike some years ago the telegraph company appealed to Congress to enact a law under which their striking employés might be put in jail?

Mr. REAGAN. It is the purpose of this House, if it should pass this bill, to give Congress this jurisdiction. And because of the fear of a supposed public opinion by the friends of this bill, because they are afraid to obey the Constitution lest the people should not approve their action, this bill which proposes to furnish a sort of means of arbitration that can not be enforced is to be enacted into law. Every member here probably knows that in the State of Missouri, in the State of Texas, in the State of Arkansas, in the State of Kansas there is now existing law by which arbitration can be had at any time by disagreeing parties having a matter in dispute which is subject to arbitration. If these men desire arbitration, they have the power to obtain it if the other party consents in every one of the four States where the present strikes and labor troubles exist.

Mr. HALL. Are not those corporations transferring all the cases in the States into the Federal courts?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly, whenever they can; and they have decisions now that prevent railroads being considered citizens of the States in which they do business. Under those decisions when a case comes up to which the railroads are a party in almost any State it can be transferred to the Federal courts, where the man of ordinary means is powerless to defend his rights, is unable to pay the necessary costs, to employ attorneys, to pay witnesses, and to get an adjustment of his rights. If you mean to be true to the laboringmen of the country you will give them the protection of the Constitution, and send the parties to the States, where the local tribunals exist, where there are remedies for every grievance that can be imagined under any probable condition of things.

As my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] sitting near me suggests, in 1877, when a former strike occurred, an appeal was made for an increase of the Federal Army to act as a police force to execute the laws within the several States. But I apprehend if this Congress assents to this jurisdiction, innocent as you say this poor bill is, which everybody understands means nothing and does nothing, except possibly to cause an accrual of some hundreds of thousands of dollars of useless expense to the Federal Government—agree that Congress has that jurisdiction, and it will not be necessary after that to invoke the aid of the Federal Army. You need only invoke the power of the Federal courts. You can pass a law which will make it a felony to strike or to do any act which railroads assume to be inimical to their interests, because if you can do the one you can do the other.

I need not tell gentlemen upon this floor that with the nearly eight thousand millions of aggregated capital in railroads, with their six hundred and fifty thousand employés engaged in carrying out their purposes—able, vigorous, energetic men—and with the power to levy taxes to any extent they desire to levy them in order to employ the ablest legal and the ablest expert talent in the country, there is always danger to popular liberty.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. Is there any less danger if these men must go to a State court than if they must go to a national court?

Mr. REAGAN. A great deal less; because the State courts are tribunals easily accessible, and litigation is much cheaper in them than in the Federal courts. But that does not go to the main question.

Mr. BRUMM. I thought you made that distinction.

Mr. REAGAN. That is one great advantage of the State courts, that common people can go into them. They are among their friends, and as litigation is much cheaper in those courts, the people can employ lawyers and have their cases determined near their homes without great expense, whereas they can not go off to remote Federal courts, held among strangers, and where the expense is very much greater. But the point I make to the gentleman from Pennsylvania—and I make it to him because I believe he is a friend of labor—the point is, that once we give this jurisdiction to Congress we will have passed the Rubicon, we will have recognized the power of Congress over this subject, and the liberty of the people may be sacrificed on the very principle now invoked in favor of popular right. Hasty legislation is always dangerous, but it is especially dangerous where it concerns interests as great as those here involved, and it is especially dangerous also when it is the result of hasty and inconsiderate action.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY].

Mr. LOWRY. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that this bill is either a fraud or a cheat. Were it, in my judgment, either of these I could not follow his example in avowing a purpose to vote for it. I do not believe with my distinguished friends from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that it infringes upon any provision of the Constitution. As I understand this bill, I conceive that the Committee on Labor has proceeded with the utmost caution and circumspection in framing it, and have sought to bring forward a measure that is entirely consistent with every constitutional provision, and one which may be calculated to meet as fully as was found to be feasible the existing emergency, and may prove to be a salutary aid in the settlement of the difficulties between capital and labor.

It has been insisted that this act is unconstitutional. It is alleged that it undertakes to confer judicial authority upon a judicial tribunal organized by virtue of its provisions. Now, sir, I undertake to say that this bill does not provide for any judicial tribunal; that it does not undertake to confer jurisdiction of a judicial character upon any tribunal. It simply provides for an arbitrament which may be voluntarily entered into by the parties to existing difficulties, and affords an opportunity for them to have the questions at issue between them arbitrated and an award made. It provides also that the awards made by such arbitrators shall be of such a character that the parties, if they so desire, will be able afterward to enforce their rights in a court of justice. Suppose the parties meet and agree to arbitrate their difficulties, whether they be railway companies or other corporations or individuals, citizens of one State or citizens of different States, when the arbitration is held and the award is made the parties, I apprehend, are bound by the conclusion reached by the arbitrators, and their rights under the arbitration may be then enforced by proceedings in the courts.

But, sir, the case of the Genesee Chief (12 Howard's Reports, 443) is cited here by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] as an authority in support of the doctrine that this bill is unconstitutional.

What was that case? That was a case where the relators, as owners of the schooner Cuba, as libellants, proceeded against the Genesee Chief to recover damages in consequence of a collision that had taken place on Lake Erie. It was insisted in the course of the argument of the case that the act under which the proceeding was brought was unconstitutional, for the reason that the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts was confined, under a proper construction of the Constitution, to the tide waters of the United States.

Judge Taney, in delivering the opinion in that case, with his accustomed incisive logic, brushed away the platitudes in which the courts had previously indulged upon the subject, and showed that the act of Congress providing for admiralty jurisdiction being applied as well to the navigable lakes and rivers of the country as to the tide waters, was wholly free from all constitutional objection, and held that the enactment simply extended the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts, and authorized them to take cognizance of and adjudicate controversies originating on such lakes and rivers in the same manner as were those arising on the tidal waters.

In the course of the argument it was suggested that the authority to pass the act extending jurisdiction might come within the provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to regulate commerce among the States; but the court held that authority did not attach under that provision, for the reason that the act was one not regulating commerce, but extending the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts in consonance with existing provisions of law. It seems to me the matter was so plain there ought not to have been much controversy upon the subject. The simple proposition contained in the act was the extension of the jurisdiction of certain judicial tribunals under provisions of law already existing.

Now what is the emergency that confronts us? By reason of our existing social and politico-economic conditions in this country as elsewhere, capital has the advantage of labor. The common law and the statutes of every State in the Union authorize the organization of capital in the form of corporations. These employ vast multitudes of men.

Questions arise between these powerful corporations and the operatives and laboring men of the country. While capital has every facility for enforcing its exactions, there are no adequate means by which labor can enforce its rights. The laboring men appeal for arbitration. We saw just the other day the magnates of a railroad corporation higgling with the representatives of the great labor organizations throughout the country who submitted in reference to existing difficulties the simple proposition, "Let us arbitrate; call ye in council one of your friends and we will bring hither another; let them call in a third; and we will submit these questions."

The agitation of this proposition has extended to this House. What will be the probable effect even of this? Since the meeting of the present Congress, when it was proposed to regulate the relations between operatives of your lines of street cars and the corporations which employ them, which had been exacting from the bone and brain and muscle of these men from fifteen to seventeen hours a day of hard labor for the comparative pittance for wages here of from $1.50 to $2, these corporations speedily came to terms, and proposed to limit their daily hours of labor to twelve and to compensate that labor by the payment of $2 for each and every day.

At the present time there are similar indications in reference to existing difficulties elsewhere. There is, at length, a disposition manifested by these contending corporations to yield to the just demands of labor. How much may the pending consideration of the question here have had to do with this? What will be the probable effect, then, of this act? Why, sir, it simply proposes to crystallize a just public sentiment. It simply provides for the payment of the expenses of three arbitrators, to be impartially chosen, and such assistance as may be required, for the purpose of conducting an investigation and formulating a sound and just conclusion to be submitted to the judgment of the public in reference to controversies which may from time to time arise. Give the people a measure of this kind; and will it not have some effect? In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, as surely as truth is omnipotent and public justice certain, so surely will these corporate bodies be compelled to yield to the demands of justice and right if you provide for putting on record a sound, considerate opinion or conclusion of impartial men in regard to any difficulties which may accidentally arise.

This bill is a step in the right direction. It is a response to the cry of distress. It is "ship ahoy" to the struggling sailor. And as the Creator himself vouchsafed to covenant with His chosen people in their time of tribulation and set His bow in the cloud as a token of the covenant, so by the passage of this bill this Congress will put its sign in the heavens as a token of a covenant that there shall be redress afforded to the laboring interests of this country; that labor shall not always be oppressed, shall not always be subject to any unwarranted exactions of capital and monopoly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I call for a vote on the pending proposition.

Mr. DUNN. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. DIBBLE. Pending the motion to adjourn I ask unanimous consent that all amendments which members may desire to offer to this bill be printed in the RECORD.

Several members objected.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 114, noes 67.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being only 33 voting in favor thereof.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will not call for a count of the other side, but announce that to-morrow morning I shall move to take up this bill, setting aside the Private Calendar for that purpose.

The motion of Mr. DUNN that the House adjourn being agreed to, the House accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. C. H. ALLEN: Petition of Andrew P. Peabody and 600 others, citizens of Cambridge, Mass., in favor of the passage of Senate bill 52, known as the Dawes bill—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BALLENTINE: Petition of H. P. McMillion, of Giles County, Tennessee, for reference of his war claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, papers in the claim of Henry P. McMillion, of Giles County, Tennessee—to the same committee.

By Mr. BARBOUR: Papers in the case of Stephen Casey—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BARKSDALE: Papers relating to the claim of Sterling Cole, of Jefferson County, Mississippi—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BRAGG: Petition of citizens of Fond du Lac County, asking for a tax on butterine—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. W. W. BROWN: Memorial of the window-glass makers of America, protesting against the reduction of the tariff—to the same committee.

By Mr. BUTTERWORTH: Petition of Mrs. Sarah Briggs, for relief—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. J. M. CAMPBELL: Petition of soldiers of the war of 1861–'65, asking for a law to allow them the difference between the value of the greenback and gold dollar at the time the greenback was paid to them—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL: Papers in the claim of James A. Whalen—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CAREY: Memorial of members of the Wyoming Legislature, in reference to the leasing of school lands in said Territory—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CATCHINGS: Papers relating to the claim of Elizabeth D. Young, of Warren County, Mississippi—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CLEMENTS: Papers in the claim of Levi W. Brooks, of Walker County, Georgia—to the same committee.

Also, two memorials of citizens of Whitfield County, Georgia, for an appropriation for educational purposes—to the Committee on Education.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 2, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EMPLOYMENT OF SUBSTITUTES, STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th of March, relative to the employment of substitutes in the Department of State, I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State on the subject.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, April 1, 1886.

SEIZURE OF THE SCHOONER LORD NELSON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, in relation to the claim of the representatives of the late Hon. James Crooks, a British subject, against this Government for the seizure of the schooner Lord Nelson in 1812. The matter is commended to the favorable consideration of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1886.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT, ALASKA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, and the accompanying report, submitted by the governor of Alaska in compliance with section 5 of the act of May 17, 1884, entitled "An act providing a civil government for Alaska."

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1886.

BEACON-LIGHT, GOVERNOR'S ISLAND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Light-House Board asking an appropriation of $100 for the establishment of a light on Governor's Island, N. Y.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REFERENCE OF A SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER also, in accordance with the rule, laid before the House the bill (S. 2012) for the erection of a monument to Abraham Lincoln; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence, on account of important business, was granted as follows:

To Mr. CABELL, for four days.

To Mr. BAKER, until Monday next.

To Mr. OUTHWAITE, for four days.

To Mr. WEST, for one week.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 58) authorizing the printing of a naval report; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 115) providing for the execution of the joint resolution of February 5, 1883, voting thanks and a medal to John F. Slater.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill (H. R. 7481) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMMOND. I reserve all points of order upon the bill.

CORRECTION.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have a correction made in the Journal. On the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] to adjourn, last evening, I am recorded as having voted in the negative. I voted in the affirmative, and I ask to have the correction made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the Journal to be examined, and if an error was made it will be corrected. [After a pause.] The Chair is informed, on an examination of the Journal, that the gentleman from Ohio is recorded as having voted in the negative.

Mr. FORAN. I should have been recorded as having voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I find in the RECORD of the proceedings of last Monday that after a pair had been arranged for me, on the motion to refer the educational bill to the Committee on Labor, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY], with whom the pair was arranged, quite naturally, on information from one of my colleagues that I would probably vote with him upon the motion, withdrew the pair. I desire to say that the information given to the gentleman from Virginia was incorrect, and that my colleague, whoever he might have been, had no authority to make such a statement. Had I been here, I should have voted against the pending motion and against any motion to refer the bill to any committee other than the one to which it should properly have been referred under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is that the gentleman from Virginia had voted, but when it was discovered that a pair had been arranged between him and the gentleman from New Jersey the gentleman from Virginia asked to withdraw his vote; but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], who had voted upon the bill, withdrew his own vote and a pair was announced for him with the gentleman from New Jersey in place of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Yes, sir; it came out right at last.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Tennessee kindly stepped in, but there was a doubt, however, thrown over the matter as to the intention of the gentleman from New Jersey in this regard, and perhaps it was due that this statement should be made so as to clear me as well of any misinformation on the subject.

DAM ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. CRISP. I present a report of a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

CHARLES F. CRISP,
W. D. BYNUM,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. N. DOLPH,
DWIGHT M. SABIN,
MATT. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement by the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to H. R. 1270, "An act to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River," submit the following in explanation of the action of the conference committee in the report submitted herewith:

The effect of the first amendment is to require that the location of the dam shall be approved by the Secretary of War.

The effect of the second amendment is to provide that in case the Government sees fit to take possession of said dam for purposes of navigation it shall not do so to the destruction of the water-power, the word "destruction" being substituted for the word "detriment."

The effect of the third amendment is to reserve to Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act without any claim of any kind arising in favor of any party in consequence of such amendment or repeal.

CHARLES F. CRISP,
W. D. BYNUM,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the House agree to the report of the conference committee.

The report of the conference committee was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. FREDERICK] asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5597), and that the same may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, which has before it several bills of a similar character.

There being no objection, the Committee on Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5597) providing for a revenue tax on all manufactured substitutes for butter and cheese, and imitations of the same, manufactured out of other ingredients than that of pure milk and cream; and the same was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

On motion of Mr. GROUT, the Committee on Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3109) to tax the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine; and the same was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move to dispense with the consideration of private business, my object being to call up the unfinished business, the arbitration bill reported from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. Under the rules do we not have the regular morning hour on Friday as well as on other days?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, unless by a vote of the House private business is dispensed with and the especial order taken up.

Mr. ROGERS. What is the vote required to dispense with private bills on Friday?

The SPEAKER. A majority, under the amended rules.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to modify his motion so that the consideration of private business may be taken up after the arbitration bill shall have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The motion can hardly be modified in that way. But the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] states his purpose is only to ask the suspension of private business until the special order is disposed of.

Mr. ROGERS. Does this do away with the morning hour for the reports from committees?

The SPEAKER. It does until the special order is disposed of.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Would it not be as well to allow the reports of committees to be made, so that pension business may be reported?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

The question being taken, there were—ayes 66, noes 73.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri make the point that a quorum has not voted?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 45.

Mr. STEELE. Count the other side.

The negative vote being taken, there were noes 73.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were yeas 154, nays 71, not voting 98; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, was agreed to.

Mr. LANDES. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. RIGGS, is confined to his room by sickness. That is the reason of his absence.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the recapitulation of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Objection was made.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my name be called, in order that I may vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall during the roll-call?

Mr. STAHLNECKER. I was not.

The SPEAKER. Then the rules prohibit the recording of the gentleman's vote upon this call.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. If I had been present, I should have voted "aye."

The following-named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. BRADY with Mr. CROXTON.

Mr. CABELL with Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOYLE with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. LEHLBACH.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. STRUBLE.

Mr. GOFF with Mr. SAYERS.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. MILLIKEN.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. LOUTTIT.

Mr. OUTHWAITE with Mr. WEST.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I find that I am paired with Mr. GOFF, of West Virginia. I therefore desire to withdraw my vote. I do not know how Mr. GOFF would vote if he were present, but if I were to cast my vote it would be in the affirmative.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. ROWELL. If Mr. THROCKMORTON were present, he would vote against the labor-arbitration bill.

Mr. CULBERSON with Mr. BUNNELL.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, with Mr. ROCKWELL.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. BROWN, of Ohio.

Mr. WARD, of Indiana, with Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. COBB with Mr. LINDSLEY.

Mr. MILLS with Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. HILL with Mr. PETTIBONE.

The following were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. MCKENNA.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.

Mr. OATES was announced as paired with Mr. BAKER on all questions for this day, and also on the labor bill. If present, Mr. BAKER would vote for the bill, Mr. OATES against it.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My colleague, Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, is announced as paired. I think it proper to state that he fell this morning and was quite seriously injured, which is the reason he is absent from the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports unless some motion is made.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to continue the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending, made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], to limit debate upon the first section and all amendments thereto to one minute. To that motion the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] has moved an amendment, to limit the debate to forty-five minutes. The question is first upon the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HAMMOND. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] will agree to thirty minutes, I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am willing to agree on thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent, the previous question having been ordered on the motion.

Mr. DIBBLE. Then, Mr. Speaker, with the acquiescence of the Committee on Labor, I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Does that motion include the prevention of debate upon amendments that may be offered?

The SPEAKER. It does. Under the rules of the House when debate is closed upon a section that also closes debate upon all amendments pending or that may thereafter be offered to the section, but does not preclude amendments.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then, Mr. Speaker, as I think there ought to be debate upon amendments, I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The House proceeded to divide on the amendment, but before the count was completed Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order will be made that all debate on the section and amendments thereto be closed in thirty minutes.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Does that include amendments yet to be proposed as well as pending amendments?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair has already stated, the effect of closing debate on the section is to close it also on all amendments offered or to be offered. The Chair understands the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] to withdraw the motion to limit debate to one minute.

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The order is then made that debate on the first section of the bill and all amendments thereto be closed in thirty minutes. The question now recurs on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

LABOR ARBITRATION.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of the controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on the first section of this bill and amendments thereto will be closed in thirty minutes from this time. The first amendment under consideration is that which was originally offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], was withdrawn by him, and was reoffered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]. The Clerk will report that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "States," in line 7, the words "between a Territory and State," and strike out the word "or" where it first occurs in line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that, in view of the order of the House closing debate on all amendments, members be permitted to send their amendments now to the Clerk's desk to be read, the discussion to proceed thereafter. This can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair will first have read the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the section the following:

"Provided, That if upon the written proposition of either party to the controversy to submit their differences to arbitration the other party shall refuse to accede to the proposition to so arbitrate, the party submitting the proposition to arbitrate, as aforesaid, may request the judge of the United States district court within whose jurisdiction the controversy exists and the parties reside to appoint the person or arbitrator provided for by this section; and said judge, upon being so requested, and upon being satisfied that one of the parties to the controversy has refused to arbitrate, as herein provided, is hereby authorized and directed to forthwith appoint said person or arbitrator."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] to send up his amendment to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the first section after the word "passengers," in the eleventh line of the printed bill, and insert the following:

"The Commissioner of Labor, at the written request of either party to the controversy, shall order an investigation to be made by the examination in public of such witnesses as shall voluntarily attend at or near the place where the controversy or difference is pending concerning such difference or controversy. Such examination shall not be commenced until at least two days' notice shall have been given to each party, and at least one day's notice to the public by advertisement of the time and place of commencing the same in one or more newspapers in current circulation in the vicinity: Provided, That whenever either party is composed of a large number of persons the written request of two or more of the leaders or officers of such party shall be a sufficient request for an examination; and written notice to two or more of the officers or leaders of such party shall be sufficient notice of such examination. And either party shall have the right to appoint one disinterested person to act as examiner. And the Commissioner of Labor shall designate one of the clerks, stenographers, or special agents of the Bureau of Labor for the same purpose. And the three persons thus designated and appointed shall be a board of examiners, with the duties, powers, and privileges hereinafter set forth. And in case either one of the parties to such difference or controversy shall neglect or refuse, for two days after the receipt of the notice hereinbefore prescribed, to appoint a person to act as examiner, then the other two examiners shall proceed to act as such board: Provided, That the party so neglecting or refusing may, notwithstanding such neglect or refusal, appoint an examiner at any time before the examination shall have been finished. In case the Commissioner of Labor deems it necessary so to do, he may detail one or more of the clerks or stenographers of the Bureau of Labor to assist in the clerical work of the said board. Such examination shall be concluded within thirty days from the date of the examination of the first witness before the said board."

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Have I the floor now for five minutes on the amendment just read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize gentlemen for debate after the various amendments have been read.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I send to the desk an amendment which I propose to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "if," in line 14, and all of lines 16 to 21 down to the word "all," in line 21, and insert "the matter shall be examined by a commission of three persons appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "carrier," in line 14 of section 1, insert "also to take notice of and inquire into the practice of certain railroad companies in maintaining a company system of life insurance to evade the payment of damages for loss of life through negligence or otherwise, the employés being compelled to keep up policies on their lives and contribute assessments therefor out of their wages."

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments to be proposed at this time the Chair will now recognize gentlemen to discuss the amendments. The time for discussion begins at 1 o'clock. In order that there may be no misapprehension, the Chair will state that these amendments have been read simply for information, and will be taken up for consideration in the order in which they have been presented.

Mr. FORAN. Mr. Chairman, during my remarks last Wednesday I stated that the only purpose that could be accomplished by this bill, should it become a law, would be to provide a means for the investigation of pending industrial controversies on railroads, provided the parties thereto desired to have such investigation; and in order that the investigation might be had in every instance I offered the amendment which has just been read. At that time I had read this bill but once, and thought it was at least a very harmless measure, for which I might safely vote.

Upon more mature reflection, however, and after hearing the views of gentlemen who have discussed it upon this floor, I am constrained to say I can not vote for it, harmless as I supposed it was. There is much force in the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] that the board may imprison for contempt Knights of Labor should they refuse to disclose the secrets of their order; at all events, the power in the bill which would compel the corporation to disclose its business secrets would also compel the Knights of Labor and other organizations of labor to disclose the operations and business of their unions and assemblies. This being true, permit me to say in all sincerity that this bill is a Trojan horse that is being forced into the walled citadel of organized labor.

I have been a trade-unionist myself, and for years was the executive officer of a large national labor organization, and I believe I know what are the aspirations, the hopes, desires, and wants of organized labor; and certainly a measure which would drive the strong arm of the law into the unions and assemblies of labor is not wanted or desired. There is a gentleman on the other side of this House, the member from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR], who has been the executive officer of one of the most intelligent labor organizations of this country, the Typographical Union, and I believe he feels as I do upon this phase of the bill, for he has an amendment which he thinks will cure that defect in the bill. But it will not.

Again, there is much force in the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], that if we recognize the right in Congress to pass this bill and establish the precedent that such legislation embodies, why may not some future Congress, relying upon that precedent, pass laws making it a felony for the employés of railroads running through the States and Territories to delay, hinder, obstruct, or interfere with the commerce of such roads or the transmission of the mails by striking or stopping work, even though their right to do so be as clear as the midday sun in an unclouded sky? Is this bill, then, not an entering-wedge which will establish such a precedent for Congressional action hereafter as may crush and rend organized labor and leave workingmen in a worse condition than they ever were before?

I am in favor of the principle of arbitration, but it is that arbitration which grows out of that spirit of conciliation and enlightened judgment which will bring the employer and the employé together in the spirit of mutual forbearance and concession. Legislative arbitration has ever been a failure. If you pass this bill I venture the assertion it will never be invoked, and the only result will be the bad precedent, which will live to plague not the inventors but those affected by it. Even voluntary arbitration, so far as labor is concerned, is only effective when the men are backed by effective and powerful organizations.

I am willing to leave this question to the organizations of labor. In these organizations the friction of mind upon mind will brighten intellect and enable labor to see with clearer vision the evils that beset it and the remedies best applicable for their eradication, and their power and their prestige will have a mollifying effect upon the selfishness of capital, and enable employers also to see with clearer visions the right course to pursue. I believe in organization. It was said of old that "knowledge is power."

What is knowledge but organized thought? A single organized thought has shaped and controlled the destinies of people and of nations; organized thought has hurled tyrants from the pinnacles of fame they reached through human blood; has struck the shackles from the limbs of the slave, and caused the pæans of liberty to be sung the world over. Every evolution through which man has reached a higher intellectual and social level has been wrought out through organization. Mind is the supreme law of human destiny, and to organized mind and the well-directed thought it evoked may be traced the progressive development of humanity, which we can read, stage by stage, in the crystallization of human thought from the dawn of history to the present day.

The Arab and the Indian are types of the earliest organizations of humanity, and from such primitive types our present civilization has been evolved by and through organization. From these remnants of barbarism down to the time Grecian glory and intelligence illumined the world and the banners of the Romans waved from the hilltops and their sabers flashed in the sunlight of half the known globe, we but follow in the footsteps of organization, and from the Dark Ages to the day the Bell of Independence proclaimed liberty to all the earth and the inhabitants thereof is but another step in the mighty trackway of organization.

It was organization that enabled Mohammed to lead the obscure Arab to a mighty empire and enabled his successors for ages to sweep the Cross before the lurid blaze of the Crescent. It was an organized thought that enabled Morse to chain the most potent invisible force in nature and through its agency annihilate time and space. It was an organized thought that enabled Bell or Edison or the Pan-Electric inventor to send the human voice along the pulsing wire a thousand miles away.

All around us there are organizations—Masons, Odd Fellows, and kindred associations—all seeking through organization higher idealities, greater diffusion of knowledge, and grander realizations of human perfection. It is through this instrumentality, through organization, that labor will work out its freedom, intellectualize the toiler, enlighten the world as to its wrongs, mold, shape, and fashion public sentiment and opinion, and, because of its great power, exact from capital, through orderly and peaceable means, its just reward. [Great applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DIBBLE. I have no complaint against the Committee on Labor for bringing before this House at this time a measure concerning the relations of capital and labor. We have an illustration of the necessity of such legislation as it is competent for the Congress of the United States to enact in this particular. The policy of Congress has been heretofore announced by establishing a bureau of labor, and appointing a commissioner thereof, and making appropriations therefor. Possessing the power to regulate interstate commerce, when the traffic of the country is interrupted by grave disputes in the West we should carefully inquire whether anything can be devised to improve such condition of affairs by appropriate legislation.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have a complaint against the Committee on Labor in relation to this matter, and that is, when they brought their bill into this House they seemed to say by their action, "We do not want any suggestion to be made to us; we propose to pass this bill as it is, or else labor shall have no remedy at all." As a friend of labor, representing a constituency largely composed of laboring men, I claim the right, in common with others on the floor of this House, to amend the bill in a friendly spirit, and to suggest to the House whether it can be improved or not. It is in that spirit I submit the amendment I have offered. Without amendment in some particulars, and especially in some other sections, I will be compelled by my deliberate convictions to oppose the bill upon its passage.

The Bureau of Labor, which has been established at an expense of $25,000 per annum and for which in the Book of Estimates an appropriation of $35,000 is asked for the next fiscal year, with its machinery, devised by this House in its cooler moments, to deal with such questions as this, is entirely ignored by the bill which has been presented to this House. And the Government, with a bureau already established, with its clerks and stenographers and all the machinery already in existence, in the language of the law, "to collect information upon the subject of labor, its relation to capital, the hours of labor, and the earnings of laboring men and women," declines to use the instrument of its own creation in the first great emergency which arises, and is to adopt a hasty, ill-considered scheme in its stead.

Now, the object of my amendment is, Mr. Chairman, to make the Commissioner of Labor, with his stenographers and his clerks, a factor in gathering this information and putting it on file and in submitting it to the intelligence of the American people. The powers of the Congress, I am bound to admit, under the Constitution, are limited, and I have put into this amendment and others which I will propose all that I conscientiously believe is within the power of Congress in this direction.

I propose first a board of examiners, in which both parties are represented, the third being one of the clerks or special agents of the Bureau of Labor. I propose afterward, in a subsequent section, which I would like to have read if there is time (but the chairman indicates that my time has about expired), that they shall invite from each party to the controversy a statement or proposition of terms upon which they will agree to adjust the difficulty, and that they shall advise and assist in such adjustment. And this is a practicable scheme, Mr. Chairman, while the other, as a basis of such settlement, in my opinion will do no good.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, in order that other gentlemen may have time I will take but a moment in the discussion of this matter. I only desire to call the attention of the committee for a few minutes to the amendment proposed by me. This amendment provides for the appointment of three United States commissioners by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to serve instead of three arbitrators proposed by the bill.

That amendment, if adopted, would give these commissioners no other powers than they get by the bill as it now stands; but it would be a commission permanent in its character, always ready for service, and gathering this information as required. It would be far preferable, in my mind, to the three arbitrators to be chosen for any one strike, whose powers would cease at the termination of that strike.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to say that I understand from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] in charge of this bill that my amendment is accepted by the committee.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I would suggest that the committee have no objection whatever to the amendment, which is to correct the phraseology of the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I shall occupy none of the time remaining for debate.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The amendment is correct, I think.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Chairman, in no other relation in business life do the employés surrender so much of their personal and individual liberty or have so little control over their own wages, their own time, as in the railway employment; and believing that it was the purpose of the committee to deal with that question of grievances and afford a remedy by arbitration, I have offered an amendment which I trust will be accepted.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it would be better to offer his resolution embracing that subject as an independent proposition and send it to the Committee on Labor, who will then consider it. I do not think it is a subject for consideration here.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is entirely germane to the subject-matter of the bill and quite as necessary as any other provision.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. This amendment is in reference to insurance alone, and I think has no relevancy here.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is necessary that this question should be settled, being a question of controversy, and possibly may avert strikes in the future. I trust there will be no objection to it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not consider it germane, and I think it would be better for the gentleman to put it in the shape I have suggested.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am obliged to the gentleman for his offer; and if it is rejected by the committee, then I shall offer it in the shape of a resolution and let it be referred to the Committee on Labor.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS].

Mr. PHELPS. I have no fear that the workingmen of this country will not get all their rights. It is only a question of time and manner; and, for my part, I do not dread the result, but I do dread the processes, and I would do what I could to make these more orderly and more efficient.

The workingman will get the rights that he lacks, just as he got those he has, by public opinion. He will attract, persuade, and convince the public. But the processes by which he gets his rights are naturally more or less wasteful, disorderly, and turbulent, because he gets his rights by proving his wrongs. He uses every effort to get public attention for, public sympathy with, and public recognition and conviction of his wrongs. As soon as he convinces the public of his wrongs the public gives him his rights so promptly, so fully, that he does not need court or Legislature. Society awards them in a flash.

Is not this the splendid record of labor's achievement in the past? Why shall it not be the experience of the future? When the workman, anxious to obtain a right, starts to convince the public he moves with the zeal of long repression. His success at first is too great. He masses and exhibits his wrongs in such shape of enormity and number that he himself is surprised and indignant, while unfortunately the public is made only more incredulous. So the spectacle which makes the workingman most impatient for action and redress makes the people slower and more reluctant to give it. Hence friction. Hence the stage now seen in Missouri, where there is disorder, turbulence, and wrongdoing. This is the dangerous stage of the process. This is the stage we should unite all our efforts to eliminate, to shorten, at least to modify in its extremest manifestations. And this we can do only by suggesting or providing the way and means by which the workingman can more quickly prove his wrongs. Methods are needed by which he can quickly, clearly, and conspicuously make his case and discover and publish its merits. This is the stage where this bill enters and this is its method. It provides a method by which the workingman may more quickly prove and advertise his wrongs.

It provides a method of arbitration, a simple one, that the plain men can understand, and this is stripped of all legal complexity, perplexity, or subtlety. It can be used promptly, and it can be used without expense. The procedure is sure to excite attention, because it is a public one; and to win respect, because its orderly steps are directed by a United States statute; and the decision is equally sure of respect and attention, for it has the shape of a judicial judgment; it goes into the public archives, and it is filed and recorded in a public office where Congress and the people can see and read it. Because this bill does give the workingman a means of quickly and conspicuously proving his wrongs, and because, in my opinion, he has only, in this country at least, to prove his wrongs to get promptly and fully his rights, I am glad to vote for this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I give due weight to the arguments which have been presented as to the propriety of this legislation. I am not fully persuaded that the interference of the Federal Government will help those whose weakness most appeals for help. I share to some extent the fear that the power now invoked with hope of relief and safety may hereafter become an instrument of danger and further oppression. But putting these doubts and fears aside, I shall vote for this bill. I vote for it, not as a panacea for the evils complained of, not as a solution of the problem of labor and capital, but as a step—it may be a short one—in the right direction.

Nor do I understand the fierce opposition which the opponents of this measure have manifested. Their bitter denunciations and declarations as to its character do not harmonize.

They all assert it is a very "harmless" thing; and in order to demonstrate their assertion they proceed to pour out the vials of their wrath upon it. They ridicule it. They epithet it. They call it, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] called it to-day, a "Trojan horse." They call it a "fraud," a "trick," a "sham." And my friend from Georgia, climaxing the whole matter, has even denounced it as a "milk-poultice."

Now, I believe a bill which has called forth all this denunciation has some meat in it. I believe that it means more than those gentlemen claim. It is not because it is harmless, but because it looks toward the settling of the grandest problem of this or of any age that it meets the opposition it does from some sources.

That problem is the problem of ages; a problem, as we know, on which was founded the French revolution; a problem that has disturbed England, Germany, Belgium, and every country of the world. But we need not look to other countries or appeal to history to illustrate the contest between labor and capital. Only the other day we saw the business of three great States paralyzed by a strike upon the railroad system of the Southwest. Only a few years ago we found the military called out to suppress what was called a "riot." Thousands of workmen out of employment—millions of property lost. These are the results which demand of the Committee on Labor attention. Answering that demand they bring in a bill, a bill that is now before the American Congress. If it be wrong, if it be inadequate, if it be a "stone" and not "bread," if it need amendment, let the wisdom of this Congress amend it. If it accomplish nothing, if it be simply "harmless," still let it be passed as at least a sentimental declaration that we feel for the woes of these men, and are willing, if we can, to remove them.

Sir, this Hall has been called the audience chamber of the nation. During the brief time I have been here I have seen standing at that bar all the great monopolies of this land. We have heard from the railroad monopolies; we have heard from the telegraph monopolies; we have heard from the bank monopolies; we have heard from the land monopolies; and to-day, in one of the committee-rooms of this House, you are hearing from one of the great telephone monopolies of the land.

All these, sir, have had their day in court; they have been not only heard but heeded; and now when this new organization, the Knights of Labor, called forth by these monopolies, comes, although their voice be but in a whisper, as this bill is, yet for one I shall listen and shall heed it, and shall hope that from it will come in the future better and more effective legislation.

Sir, this question can not be settled by a single act of legislation. It is a great question—one of the greatest of the hour. Every year it grows in magnitude and importance. Need I remind this House of the rapidity of that growth?

Only a few years ago, within the memory of the youngest man who hears me, the three great arteries of commerce between the East and West and North and South were the Mississippi River, the Great Lakes, and the Erie Canal. There has been no period in the history of our country when the free navigation of these great water ways could have been interrupted without a war. The tonnage on the Mississippi River passing any given point in the year 1884 amounted to 3,000,000 tons; the freight tonnage passing during the same year through Saint Mary's Canal, the throat of the lakes, was 3,256,628 tons; the tonnage of the Erie Canal to tide water was 2,853,764 tons—making a total for all of these great trade avenues of 9,110,392 tons.

Important as are these routes of transportation, immense as is their tonnage, how insignificant they become when compared with the aggregate business of only four of the great trunk lines of the country, and these are but a part of the great system which girdles and penetrates every State of our Union and which is involved in this proposed legislation. Consider for a moment the statistics I now read and tell me whether a bill which comes to the rescue of the weak against the colossal power represented here does not merit our support.

The tonnage of the four trunk lines of railway was in 1884 as follows: Pennsylvania, 22,583,825 tons; New York Central, 10,212,418 tons; New York and Erie, 16,219,598 tons; Baltimore and Ohio, not including 12,000,000 bushels of grain, 5,103,861 tons; an aggregate of 44,119,722 tons per annum, or nearly five times the combined tonnage of the Erie Canal, the great lakes, and the Mississippi River.

To-day, therefore, four men—the four presidents of these trunk roads—wield a power greater than that of many potentates of the earth.

What does that mean? Four men can reduce the wages of fifty thousand men. Four men can control and increase the charges on freight until the farmer on your Western border can not labor productively for his family. Four men organized in their own interests can control an aggregate capital amounting to a hundred millions of dollars and a grand army of employés.

If those employés organize for protection against this overshadowing power and ask us for the poor privilege of being heard by peaceful arbitration enforced under the sanction of the laws and Constitution, in the name of justice, in the name of equal rights, I say let us hear their complaints, and let us invoke public opinion, that stands back of all these movements, whether of capital or labor, and eventually controls them; let us invoke that public opinion in the settlement of these grave and complicated difficulties.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, every labor organization in this country has appealed for arbitration of the differences between capital and labor. The Knights of Labor in their platform ask for the enactment of laws providing for the arbitration of differences between employers and employés.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman just read that section of the platform which asks for arbitration?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes. Here it is:

The enactment of laws providing for arbitration between employers and employed and to enforce the decision of the arbitrators.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is it. I wanted it read.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The Greenback Labor platform calls for arbitration in this language:

To persuade employers to agree to arbitrate all differences which may arise between them and their employés, in order that the bonds of sympathy between them may be strengthened, and that strikes may be rendered unnecessary.

At my request the Knights of Labor sent to this city Mr. George E. McNeill, of Boston, who co-operated with our committee and gave us the benefit of his information and advice on this arbitration question; and he believes implicitly that voluntary arbitration alone is necessary.

On last Sunday night I was at the Astor House, New York, in consultation with the executive committee of the Knights of Labor, seeking to get their views and their judgment as to how these difficulties could be settled, these conflicts between labor and capital averted, and peace restored in that section of country from which I come; and I see men on this floor who stand back and say, "We favor neither compulsory arbitration nor voluntary arbitration;" who say, "These issues can not be aided by law, but may eventually have to be settled by the shedding of blood." That is their judgment, and they have so stated. Mr. Chairman, I stand here to defend the American workingman against any such doctrine as that. The workingmen of this country have stood for years appealing for fair play, appealing for law, appealing for justice, appealing for their rights, and to-day we are almost on the verge of a volcano.

Thousands of men are standing idle, and thousands of people in our cities are suffering for fuel and food as a result of these labor troubles, and all the time these Constitution cranks stand upon this floor quibbling about constitutional questions instead of considering how honor, how manhood, how justice can be brought to bear to settle these difficulties. Let the verdict go out from this House; let the voice of the American people, represented on this floor, declare that there is but one way to settle these troubles; that the parties must come together, must end this conflict, must stop disorder, prevent bloodshed, and let peace and prosperity again extend throughout the land. One side or the other must yield, concessions must be made, and the side that refuses to make concessions will soon find a condition of affairs that will end the trouble as speedily as a unanimous revolution. I appeal to members, stand by your committee; vote down these amendments; put your heel on the class of men here who can suggest nothing, but who are mere obstructionists, mere barnacles upon their party. [Applause.]

Mr. McKINLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKINLEY. The gentleman did not state what was the result of his interview with the executive committee of the Knights of Labor in New York—whether they favored arbitration or not.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. They did. I also received a telegram from them last Monday to that effect.

Mr. HAMMOND. Did they ask you to report the compulsory clause which your committee repudiated?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If I can find the dispatch, perhaps I had better get it for you.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I think the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] misapprehends the spirit of the Committee on Labor. As a member of that committee, I want to repeat what I said two days ago upon this floor, that I for one will welcome any amendment that is in the line of perfecting this bill. I hope these amendments will be taken up one by one, read carefully at the desk, considered and voted on intelligently by this House, and I shall be satisfied, whatever conclusion is arrived at with reference to the adoption or rejection of any of these amendments, if that action tends toward the perfecting of this measure. The only thing that the Committee on Labor have tried to guard against by limiting debate was that their bill or a bill on this subject should not be floated out to the sea of oblivion on a torrent of talk.

Mr. DIBBLE. Why would not the committee allow amendments to be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I did not understand the committee to object. For myself I think amendments ought to have been printed.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this subject is now closed by order of the House.

Mr. McKINLEY. I ask unanimous consent to offer at this time an amendment to the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can send it to the desk to be now read, and to be considered in the order in which it is presented. The Clerk will read for information the amendment which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKINLEY] proposes to submit to the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4 of the printed section strike out the words "common carriers;" and in the fifth and sixth lines strike out the words "whether said common carriers be private persons or corporations;" so as to make the section read:

"That whenever differences or controversies arise between railroad companies engaged in the transportation of property or passengers between two or more States of the United States, or within the Territories of the United States, or within the District of Columbia, and the employés of said common carriers," &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. KELLEY. I understand my amendment is assented to by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is entirely acceptable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. But it must be acted on by the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, after the word "States," insert the words "between a Territory and State;" and strike out the word "or" where it first occurs in line 7, making it read "between two or more States of the United States, between a Territory and State, within the Territories of the United States, or within the District of Columbia," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendment which was sent to the desk by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN].

Mr. FORAN. I withdraw that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will next read the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "passengers," in line 11, and insert the following:

"The Commissioner of Labor, at the written request of either party to the controversy, shall order an investigation to be made, by the examination in public of such witnesses as shall voluntarily attend, at or near the place where the controversy or difference is pending, concerning such difference or controversy. Such examination shall not be commenced until at least two days' notice shall have been given to each party, and at least one day's notice to the public, by advertisement of the time and place of commencing the same, in one or more newspapers in current circulation in the vicinity: Provided, That whenever either party is composed of a large number of persons, the written request of two or more of the leaders or officers of such party shall be a sufficient request for an examination; and written notice to two or more of the officers or leaders of such party shall be sufficient notice of such examination. And either party shall have the right to appoint one disinterested person to act as examiner, and the Commissioner of Labor shall designate one of the clerks, stenographers, or special agents of the Bureau of Labor for the same purpose; and the three persons thus designated and appointed shall be a board of examiners, with the duties, powers, and privileges hereinafter set forth. And in case either one of the parties to such difference or controversy shall neglect or refuse for two days after the receipt of the notice hereinbefore prescribed to appoint a person to act as examiner, then the other two examiners shall proceed to act as such board: Provided, That the party so neglecting or refusing may, notwithstanding such neglect or refusal, appoint an examiner at any time before the examination shall have been finished. In case the Commissioner of Labor deems it necessary so to do, he may detail one or more of the clerks or stenographers of the Bureau of Labor to assist in the clerical work of the said board. Such examination shall be concluded within thirty days from the date of the examination of the first witness before the said board."

The amendment of Mr. DIBBLE was rejected, there being—ayes 11, noes 64.

The CHAIRMAN. The next amendment which will be voted upon is that of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "if," in line 14, and all of lines 16 to 21 down to the word "all," in line 21, and insert "the matter shall be examined by a commission of three persons, appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" so that the section will read:

"That whenever differences or controversies arise between common carriers engaged in the transportation of property or passengers, whether said common carriers be private persons or corporations, between two or more States of the United States, between a Territory and State, within the Territories of the United States, or within the District of Columbia, and the employés of said common carriers, which differences or controversies may hinder, impede, obstruct, interrupt, or affect such transportation of property or passengers, or when such employés, or any of them, allege that he or they have been treated unjustly or oppressively, either as to wages, hours of labor, or otherwise, by such common carrier, upon the written proposition of either party to the controversy, the matter shall be examined by a commission of three persons, appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, all three of whom shall be citizens of the United States and wholly impartial and disinterested in respect to such differences or controversies; and the three persons thus selected and appointed shall be, and they are hereby, created and constituted a board of arbitration, with the duties, powers, and privileges hereinafter set forth."

The amendment was not agreed to, there being—ayes 12, noes 60.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word carrier, in the fourteenth line, first section, insert as follows:

"Also to take notice of and inquire into the practice of certain railroad companies in maintaining a company system of life-insurance to evade the payment of damages for loss of life through negligence or otherwise, the employés being compelled to keep up policies on their lives and contribute assessments therefor out of their wages."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will next be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY].

Mr. MCKINLEY. This amendment simply strikes out the words "common carriers," in the fourth line, and inserts "railroad companies," and in the fifth line strikes out the words "whether said common carriers be private persons or corporations." Otherwise the amendment leaves the section as reported by the committee. I understand it is not objected to by the chairman of the Committee on Labor or by the majority of that committee.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. There is no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 4, strike out the words "common carriers" and insert "railroad companies."

In line 5, strike out "whether said common carriers be private persons or corporations."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will next be taken upon an amendment submitted by the Committee on Labor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the word "passengers," in line 11, all down to the word "if," in line 14; the words proposed to be stricken out being the following:

"Or when such employés or any of them allege that he or they have been treated unjustly or oppressively, either as to wages, hours of labor, or otherwise, by such common carrier."

The amendment was agreed to; there being—ayes 68, noes 3.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. In view of the amendment which has just been adopted I desire to move an amendment, to insert after the words "common carriers," in the ninth line, the words "organized into an association or associations either under a charter granted according to law or under a written constitution," so that the other party——

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I object to debate. Debate has been closed. Let the gentleman send his amendment to the Clerk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the first section by inserting after the word "carriers," in line 9, "organized into an association or associations either under a charter granted according to law or under a written constitution."

The amendment was rejected; there being—ayes 45, noes 56.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I move to strike out, in line 9, "common carriers" and in lieu thereof to insert "railroad companies."

Mr. CANNON. It makes the section consistent.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DANIEL. How about "common carriers," in the fourth line?

The CHAIRMAN. That has been stricken out.

Mr. CRAIN. I move to strike out "common carriers" wherever it occurs in the first section and in lieu thereof to insert "railroad companies."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Let it be stricken out and "railroad companies" inserted wherever it occurs in the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. In lines 17 and 18 strike out "common carriers" and insert "railroad companies."

A MEMBER. Do I understand it is the object of the gentleman not to permit other common carriers to be bound by this law?

Mr. LONG. It has been already adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection it will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no further amendment to the first section, the Clerk will read the second section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the board of arbitration provided for in the first section of this act shall possess all the powers and authority in respect to administering oaths, subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance, preserving order during the sittings of the board, punishing for contempt, and requiring the production of papers and writings, and all other powers and privileges, in their nature applicable, now possessed and belonging to United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States; and said board of arbitration may appoint a clerk and employ a stenographer, and prescribe all reasonable rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions and purposes of this act, looking to the speedy advancement of the differences and controversies submitted to them to a conclusion and determination. Each of said arbitrators shall take an oath to honestly, fairly, and faithfully perform his duties, and that he is not personally interested in the subject-matter in controversy, which oath may be administered by any State or Territorial officer authorized to administer oaths. The third person so selected and appointed as aforesaid shall be the president of said board; and any order, finding, conclusion, or award made by a majority of such arbitrators shall be of the same force and effect as if all three of such arbitrators concurred therein or united in making the same.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I desire to offer an amendment by moving to strike out all of the second section down to the word "each," in line 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the words which are proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the board of arbitration provided for in the first section of this act shall possess all the powers and authority in respect to administering oaths, subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance, preserving order during the sittings of the board, punishing for contempt, and requiring the production of papers and writings, and all other powers and privileges, in their nature applicable, now possessed and belonging to United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States; and said board of arbitration may appoint a clerk and employ a stenographer, and prescribe all reasonable rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions and purposes of this act, looking to the speedy advancement of the differences and controversies submitted to them to a conclusion and determination.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That amendment, Mr. Chairman, is offered in good faith. Its purpose is to remove as far as possible one of the constitutional objections urged to this bill, and which seems to me wholly unanswerable.

This section creates a legal tribunal obnoxious to the provision of the Constitution which requires officers to be appointed by the President, by the courts of law, or by the heads of Departments. It leaves all controversies to the voluntary arbitrament of the parties.

That Congress has no power to enact this statute under the third article, creating the judicial department, is too clear for serious debate; that no such power can be deduced from the grant to regulate commerce among the several States is, I submit, also clear. But the amendment I offer may remove the objection that it also violates section 2 of Article II. It also removes those serious objections which all thoughtful men must entertain against intrusting such powers to tribunals wholly without responsibility, and whose numbers may be very great.

It strikes out only so much as creates new offices, fills them by the selection of unofficial persons, and clothes these officers, paid by the General Government, with the power of fine and imprisonment and unlimited power of ransacking the private papers and exposing the private affairs of whomsoever this irresponsible tribunal may order to produce papers.

While I offer this in absolute good faith to perfect the bill, if it is intended it shall pass, I desire to protest against the passage of the bill. I believe it is a grave, and I believe it will be a dangerous, mistake.

If there be anything in this bill it is a step in a certain direction. It is the corner-stone of a superstructure which is to be erected on it. It is the seed of a growth that is hereafter to give us trouble.

This is the beginning of a new jurisprudence. This is the foundation of a new and indefinite and dangerous jurisdiction. This is the creation of novel, uncertain, and indefinite judicial tribunals. It seems to me before we take so grave a step more consideration should be given it than has been given to it.

Mr. Chairman, for one I disbelieve in their being any virtue in legislation to aid in the solution of these grave problems. I do not believe in the power of statutory law. We do not progress when we attempt to crystallize progress upon the statute-book. I deny that this is a paternal government, to be constantly interfering with the progress of thought and of civilization by putting its hand, unhallowed and unwise, into that progress. Every step we take in that direction renews the too common disposition of mankind to seek the remedy for ailments in legislation instead of finding it in some philosophic solution of the problem which has been submitted to them.

I plead for a higher independence. I plead for a nobler manhood. I plead for an ampler liberty than that which is found in the leaves of a statute-book or in the clamors of the lobbies of a legislative body. [Applause.]

In the name of labor—for the blessedest thing which ever crowned mankind was honest sweat on an honest man's brow, working an honest day's work—in the name of labor I protest against this interference with its progress toward the solution of its own problems.

And deeper than that, sir, I protest in the name of liberty against class legislation. We have no laborers as a class in America. Every boy born under the Star-Spangled Banner is born to glorious opportunity. He is not born to real poverty, although the winds of heaven may come through the crevices in his humble cabin, and there may be but little blanket on his limbs. He is born to boundless opportunities. [Great applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will take the floor and yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Let us not make this classification; let us not divide our citizenship permanently into capital and labor. Let us not say there runs this dividing line between American citizens. The noblest capital of a free country is her laborers, and these are the possible capitalists of the future. From the ranks of labor are recruited the brain of capital. Let us strive to fuse rather than separate these mighty forces—to coalesce rather than divide.

In the name, therefore, not only of all laboring men, but in the name of all the future, I protest against the whole spirit of the bill and the direction in which it goes.

Besides that, Mr. Chairman, we are working out these great problems to-day. They are being solved. Day by day and hour by hour they are undergoing a solution, the wisest of all solutions. We may not know how it comes. We may not know the solution; but, thank God, a wiser head, a stronger hand than ours is leading in it. We are coming day by day to the time when the capital of this country and the labor of this country will find the true principle which will harmonize their relations and bring about a participation in the profits of industry. The only remedy possible by legislation—the real remedy, gentlemen—I repeat, is equal laws. Let us distribute the burdens of our civilization equally upon labor and capital. [Applause.] That is all we can do. Make capital pay its share of the burdens; take from labor the burdens which have been unequally imposed upon it.

Say by equal laws that there shall be a just distribution of the burdens; that the burden shall no longer gall this burden-bearing back, and that labor shall have a just and equal consideration under our laws with capital. I say to my Democratic friends, this bill is not in the direction they want us to go. This is not the remedy for the burdens upon oppressed labor. But there is a remedy: let us reduce taxation. [Great applause.] Let us go back to the old Democratic doctrine of free and equal rights to all. [Applause.]

To you gentlemen upon the other side let me say there is no party advantage in this bill. They for whom you seek to legislate will turn and rend you when they take up and find on an examination of this bill that by its operations in the future there will be the means by which strikes can be made punishable under law by arrest and imprisonment.

For the next step will be that voluntary arbitration must give place to involuntary arbitration, involuntary arbitration will give place to Federal jurisdiction, and Federal jurisdiction will be held by capital, and they will find—those in whose names we pretend to legislate—that it has been a snare which has been given to them in place of a remedy, for the measure proposed here is a disaster.

No, Mr. Chairman, we are overwise; our highest duty to-day, so far as direct legislation on this precise question is involved, is "Hands off!" The Ark of the Lord may seem to need our help, but he who touches it with unnecessary, even if loving, hands may find death. Hands off of this great problem! This is holy ground; and let us not profane it with partisan devices, nor even with well-intended but unwise expedients. We only postpone the true solution; we only delay the coming agreement; we render more difficult the final settlement.

I simply wanted, after I saw this morning when on a rising vote a majority refused to consider this bill, while on a vote by yeas and nays a great majority determined to consider it—I wanted simply to go upon record, if my name is ever remembered, that in the American Congress I stood for true labor, for manhood, for liberty, for the dignity of labor, which is asking only a fair-living chance in the great battle of life. [Applause.]

Mr. McKINLEY Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. The whole purpose of the amendment is to destroy whatever of good results may be expected from the passage of this bill; and I can readily see why a gentleman who is opposed to this system of settling differences between employer and employé should offer the amendment which is here proposed; am quite sure, Mr. Chairman, that the fervent and eloquent words of my distinguished friend will be welcomed by the laboring men of the land as a sovereign cure for their evils and their discontent. I feel very certain that the general platitudes in which he has indulged about the equality of all men in this country and the dignity of labor, and the general statement that the way to help these workingmen is to reduce taxation, will be accepted by them as a never-failing remedy. I am sure every laboring man in this country will hail with acclamation these soft words as a sure panacea for all his troubles.

I am opposed to the amendment because I believe in the principle and tendency of the bill. I would amend it in some particulars if I could. The bill confers no rights or privileges touching arbitration which are not now enjoyed by common carriers and those engaged in their service. It leaves them where it finds them, with the right of voluntary arbitration, to settle their differences through a peaceful and orderly tribunal of their own selection. It only follows the principle recognized in many States of the Union, notably in Ohio and Massachusetts, and gives national sanction and encouragement to a mode of settlement of grievances between employer and employé which is approved by the best judgment of the country and the enlightened sentiment of all civilized peoples.

While the bill does not compel arbitration, its passage here will not be without influence as a legislative suggestion in commending the principle to both capital and labor as the best and most economic way of composing differences and settling disagreements which experience has uniformly shown, in the absence of an amicable adjustment, results in loss to all classes of the community, and to none more than the workingmen themselves.

If by the passage of this simple measure arbitration as a system shall be aided to the slightest extent or advanced in private or public favor, or if it shall serve to attract the thoughtful attention of the people to the subject, much will have been accomplished for the good order of our communities and for the welfare and prosperity of the people.

I am in favor of this bill for what it is and only for what it is. It does not undertake to do impossible things or cross the line of safety. I will regret if it shall deceive anybody, and if it is the purpose of anybody to make believe that its passage is a cure for the evils and discontent which pervade society, I must disclaim now any part or share in such purpose or expectation, for it will not, and can not, and nobody supposes it will. It simply provides that when the railroad companies operating through two or more States or in the Territories and their employés shall agree upon and consent to an arbitration this bill will aid, encourage, and assist the parties concerned to get at the truth, to probe to the bottom, ascertain the facts of the situation, by which the board will be enabled to act intelligently and justly to all interests involved. This is the whole of it in scope and extent, and can not and will not deceive any one.

It is said there is no way to enforce the judgment of the arbitrators, and therefore it is a nullity. I have the least concern on that score. I have no fear that after the railroad corporation and its employés have united in an arbitration its judgment will be disobeyed or not acquiesced in as final and conclusive. Neither will venture in the absence of fraud to ignore the award of a tribunal of their own selection, in which both have voluntarily confided for the settlement of their differences. We need borrow no trouble on that account. Refusal to obey the judgment of the arbitration would be the exception and not the rule, and an award honestly reached will be sacredly observed. Nor am I troubled because there is no compulsion to arbitrate in the first instance. Either party provided for in the bill, believing it has a genuine grievance, and inviting the other to arbitrate, will occupy a vantage ground which the other can not long successfully defy. There is a sense of fair play among the people which, when crystallized into public judgment, is as potent, ay, more potent than statute or judicial decree. No railroad corporation, no labor union, no body of laboring men could long hold out against a fair and equitable demand, backed by a willingness to submit the justice of that demand to a board of competent arbitrators. In any view there is no harm in trying this experiment; and in this effort, small and inconsequential as it may seem to be, I am confident we are moving in the right direction, and nothing but good can result.

There is another feature of this bill which I regard of great practical value—that feature which provides for the subpœnaing and compelling the attendance of witnesses and the payment of the necessary expenses of the arbitration. It places both parties upon an equality in pursuing the investigation. A lack of means upon the one hand or the other will not impair the fullest consideration. The humblest and poorest can send for persons and papers without incurring an expense which very often they can illy bear, and the compensation of the board comes out of the public Treasury. Neither party is subject to the expense of the investigation, and the laboring men will not be required to draw from their scanty savings or assess their fellow-workmen to meet actual expenses. This overcomes the disadvantage of limited means on the one hand and avoids any advantage which might occur from bounteous means on the other. It equalizes their condition for a thorough investigation and a complete disclosure of the true situation. That provision alone is worth to the cause of arbitration much more than it will cost the national Treasury.

Then in case of disagreement after arbitration the testimony in full can be published for the information of all. The great public is put in possession of the grievances and can judge who is right and who is wrong; and the public judgment, whatever it may be upon the one side or the other, will be more forceful, more commanding, more certain of considerate attention than any penalty we could impose by legislative enactment. I have listened patiently to this debate from its beginning, and have heard no good reason given why this House should not pass this bill. I am not troubled about its constitutionality. I do not believe it is open to constitutional objection. I believe that a constitution which gives Congress control of the railroads operating through two or more States to regulate the rate of freights is broad enough to justify us in taking cognizance between these same railroads and the employés along their lines, and furnish the machinery for a peaceful arbitration, voluntarily agreed upon among themselves, of any differences or disagreements which may arise between them. If the one is constitutional the other surely is. Both are important problems demanding a solution, and both, I trust, will be dealt with by this Congress with fairness and justice to all.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, in arbitration as a principle; I believe it should prevail in the settlement of international differences. It represents a higher civilization than the arbitrament of war. I believe it is in close accord with the best thought and sentiment of mankind; I believe it is the true way of settling differences between labor and capital; I believe it will bring both to a better understanding, uniting them closer in interest and promoting better relations, avoiding force, avoiding unjust exactions and oppression, avoiding the loss of earnings to labor, avoiding disturbances to trade and transportation; and if this House can contribute in the smallest measure, by legislative expression or otherwise, to these ends it will deserve and receive the gratitude of all men who love peace, good order, justice, and fair play.

[When Mr. MCKINLEY had spoken for five minutes the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONG. If recognized, I will yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. WISE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be allowed to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Ohio will be permitted to proceed for five minutes further.

There was no objection.

[Mr. MCKINLEY resumed and concluded his remarks as above.]

Mr. HEWITT. I have been unable to take any part in the general debate; but perhaps that is not to be regretted in view of the speech made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], in the general scope and conclusions of which I concur. It is the speech of a man who has given patient and intelligent study to the difficult question as to how the distribution of property shall be placed upon an equitable basis. Arbitration has been developed as one remedial agency in the procession from the unequal distribution of the proceeds of industry toward that better condition of society wherein every man will be rewarded according to his work. My objection to this bill is that it will arrest the healthy progress which is now going on steadily toward this ultimate aim of all social effort.

Prior to 1848 there was no chance for the workingmen in Europe to organize themselves into bodies recognized by the law. But the revolution of 1848 left that one beneficent result as the heritage of the working classes that they could organize; and in England they proceeded to organize themselves into trade unions, which in 1867 had become so powerful that the conspiracy laws were shortly afterward repealed, and they were recognized as legal organizations. From that hour the work of reform began. Then the arbitration movement had a significance. Then the labors of Mr. Rupert Kettle, who first proceeded and carried it into effect in the midland counties of England, and of Mr. Mundella, a manufacturer at Nottingham, now a member of the British ministry, made it possible to institute arbitration for the settlement of disputes, because organization had enabled the workingmen to be powerful enough to strike and to maintain a strike by their mutual contributions. The great lesson had been learned that rights can only be secured by moral force, and that force rests on thorough organization.

When it was recognized by the employers of Great Britain that the workingmen were able to hold their own after repeated contests they reluctantly came to the remedy of arbitration. It was the workingmen who, by their own power and inherent force developed by organization, coerced the employers of Great Britain into the recognition of the principle of arbitration.

Thus the beneficent results of arbitration came from voluntary organization. For all that time there had been a law upon the statute-books of Great Britain which provided for compulsory arbitration, and yet it was a dead letter. Twice that law has been amended; and the last time, in 1872, the law advocated by Mr. Mundella, the great father of arbitration in England, was put into effect. And yet under that law not one single case, as I am informed and believe, has ever been pressed to a conclusion. That is the law which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] has copied and proposes we shall substitute for this bill. But that law has also been and is to-day a dead letter on the statute-books of Great Britain. Meanwhile arbitration has marched on with majestic strides until finally every trade in England is organized by voluntary action, and has secured tribunals in which committees of masters meet with committees of workmen sitting around the same table as we do in our committee-rooms.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COWLES was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. HEWITT.

Mr. HEWITT. I am much obliged to the gentleman from North Carolina for his courtesy. I was saying that to-day in every trade in Great Britain may be found and are found at stated intervals committees of masters and workmen sitting around the same table as our committees sit around the tables of our committee-rooms.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT. Certainly; but I should like as little of my time consumed as possible.

Mr. GLOVER. I understood the gentleman to say the substitute offered for this bill had been a failure in England. Is there not ample testimony in the report taken by the Senate Committee on Capital and Labor that that bill, so far from being a failure, has been a great success, and has tended to do away with strikes and industrial outrages in that country?

Mr. HEWITT. I do not think the evidence points to the conclusion of my friend from Missouri. I have followed the law with the greatest possible interest for the reason that my friend Mr. Mundella was the advocate of it. I am in very close relations with him and I know that he expected great results from it, but greater results have flowed from not availing of the law than from taking advantage of it.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Mundella is not the author of that law.

Mr. HEWITT. Mr. Mundella was the advocate of the law of 1872 and is still the advocate of the law of 1872, but he will frankly admit to everybody that the voluntary action of the manufacturers and the workingmen have achieved results which are more beneficent than those achieved under that law.

Mr. Chairman, what has happened? They come together, these employers and employés, upon terms of perfect equality; they select an umpire, and it is not considered beneath the dignity of the greatest statesman of Great Britain, when invited by one of these trades organizations, to act as umpire. They discuss every phase of the condition of the business. I have attended several of those sittings myself. No legislative body in the world can show greater sense, greater courtesy, greater patience than is shown in those voluntary assemblies convened to settle trades disputes.

Now, what has been the fruit of this? To-day, as the result of these conferences (in which cost sheets are produced, profits are stated with the most entire frankness, every feature of the business is made known freely and honestly by the employers and as freely discussed by the employés)—the result is that profit-sharing, which as my friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] has said is the final solution of this great question—profit-sharing has made its way into the great establishments of Great Britain and is rapidly extending; and if we will allow our workingmen and our employers to come together in the same spirit, of their own free will and not upon compulsion, profit-sharing, which has only begun in this country, will occupy the whole field of human industry, and then you will hear no more of controversies between capital and labor. But arbitration, leading to profit-sharing, can come only as the result of organization on the part of the workingmen, and the workingmen now for the first time understand that they must perfect their organizations.

Has not the grand master of the Knights of Labor within a few days notified his subordinate assemblies (if that be the proper designation) that they are not to organize any more lodges until he can make those already organized understand their rights and duties? What the workingmen of this country require is not more law, but what they have in England, perfect organization—to get out of the formative state which has produced the existing differences between the grand master of the Knights of Labor and his subordinate at Saint Louis.

When they perfect their organizations and come to a railroad company or any other great employer and demand arbitration they will not only get it by the force that will inhere in their organization, but they will be welcomed by the employers here, as they now are and as once they were not in Great Britain, as bringing a solution for what is the great dread of employers, the cessation of work and profits, and the great trial of the workmen, the loss of the means of earning daily bread for themselves and their families.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT. In a moment. Pass this bill, and you transfer the reliance of the workmen from themselves to the Government of the United States, by which you will postpone to another age that equitable distribution of property which is the aim of all wise legislation, the hope of every reformer, as it has been the dream of good men in every age from the time of Plato. All that we can do in the way of legislation is to remove the obstacles created by law to the free play and organization of labor.

We can repeal the unjust features of the conspiracy laws, if any survive on the statute-book; we can collate the facts in regard to the production and the distribution of wealth; we can adjust taxation so that its burden shall fall upon accumulated property instead of bearing upon productive agencies; but we must be careful not to undermine the habit of self-reliance which alone can make the workman strong and free. By self-help the workmen of this age have achieved whatever improvement has been made in their condition, and by self-help alone will they be able to attain the largest possible share of the fruits of industry consistent with that preservation of capital which is essential to prosperity.

This bill tends to undermine this vital principle of self-help, and encourages them to look to the Government for relief. For this reason I shall vote against it, although I am, and always expect to be, the earnest advocate of the principle of arbitration wherever it can be applied by voluntary action, looking always to the final outcome of friendly intercourse between employers and employés in sharing the profits of business in a more direct and comprehensible method than that which now exists under the wages system. I believe that such a system of participation is not only possible but inevitable, when labor becomes thoroughly organized and depends upon itself and not upon the aid of Congress for the recognition and enforcement of its just rights.

But let labor avoid all outside interference, and especially let it shun Federal interference, when it takes the shape of a law which defines no rights, imposes no duties, and provides no sanctions. Of this nature is the bill under consideration, which is only defended on the ground that it is an expression of opinion in favor of the principle of arbitration—a principle in regard to which there is no controversy, and in favor of which every man in this House will cheerfully register his vote. Whatever it does or professes to do more than this is mischievous, in so far as it tends to divert the attention of labor from the work of organization and preparation for the time when capital shall cease to be the master and become the servant of labor.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] allow me in his time to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] a question?

Mr. LAWLER. I will see as I go along. Mr. Chairman, since I have had the honor of occupying a seat here my relations with the gentlemen with whom I am associated have been at all times of the most pleasant character; but we have reached a condition of things in this country where it becomes the duty of every man to speak his honest convictions just as he feels. We do not expect to find men on this floor, who are themselves great employers of labor—capitalists or monopolists, if the term must be used—to have much feeling in common with those who have sprung from the ranks of labor, who have experienced all the trials and tribulations of workingmen, and who come from large cities where thousands of men are idle, as thirty-five thousand workingmen are idle to-day in the city of Chicago alone.

Statistics show us that in the United States at the present time there are a million and a half of workingmen unemployed and their families suffering for the necessaries of life. And yet, in the face of this condition of affairs, we are asked here to vote $77,000,000, for what? Not to give employment to the unemployed—not a bit of it; but to educate a certain class of people without regard to the million and a half of American workingmen who are idle and whose families are starving.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud to be associated with twelve other gentlemen from twelve different States as members of the Committee on Labor.

I have the highest regard and respect for gentlemen generally who have spoken on this question, but I have no respect for the disgruntled member of the committee who is fighting this bill. For myself, I am proud to make the admission here that I started life in a brick-yard at the age of twelve years; yet I trust that in my association with my fellow-members here, be it for this term or be it longer, they will always find me acting the part of a gentleman.

Here is a subject to which the Committee on Labor have given a good deal of their time and attention. In the bill as originally presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] they found many objectionable features. In view of the condition of affairs existing in the country, they met on Monday and remained in session until midnight, so as to put this bill into shape for presentation to the House. To the opponents of this bill I would say, you have had three long months in which to prepare something on this question and you have not done so; yet you insult the intelligence and disparage the good intentions of the gentlemen on that committee, who have given to this subject their undivided time and attention.

They believe this is an honest bill. It represents their conscientious convictions; and I venture to suggest that the chairman of our committee should have forced this bill to immediate passage, should have secured, if possible, the voting down of every amendment, and placed ever member of this body on record before the country.

This legislation, gentlemen, it is true, is new. You have been legislating for the other side of this question during twenty-five years. We make the admission that capital is necessary. We welcome these great railroads that do so much toward building up this country; but we say that the great mass of toiling people in this land are not satisfied to-day with 57 cents for a day's labor, as now paid under the Gould system.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRAIN obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. LAWLER.

Mr. LAWLER. Gentlemen on this floor have had considerable to say about this man Jay Gould. I am free to say—and I do not feel that I am expressing any communistic ideas—that if Jay Gould were hanged to a lamp-post in New York it would be a blessing to the United States. [Laughter.] I will state my reason for that remark: This man Jay Gould, before he gets done with this trouble, may be the cause, through his most damnable methods of carrying on his matters in this country, of hundreds and thousands of deaths by means of bloodshed in the States where these strikes are now raging. I say that the death of a man like this is nothing compared with the losses which may occur unless these difficulties are settled.

We have had sentimental questions raised here; we have had the "bloody-shirt." Gentlemen who spoke on the pension bill seemed to think that the people are still glad to have them flaunt the bloody shirt. But there is no sentimental business in this matter. The demand now is for justice to the laboring classes.

I believe that if this bill be passed it can result in no harm; on the contrary, the discussion that has already taken place on this floor has had a healthy effect on the country. This bill is an honest bill. If it should hereafter appear that there is anything wrong in it Congress will have just as much right to amend or repeal it as it has to-day to enact it. Since the publication of this bill last Sunday we have not heard from any part of the country any opposition to it. We take it for granted that the Knights of Labor and the toiling masses will be satisfied with a trial of this bill. The Committee on Labor asks this Congress to give some consideration to the rights of these people. We are not here to antagonize capital, corporations, or anything of that kind; but we are here for the first time in twenty-five years to say that it is time that some legislation should be enacted in behalf of the toiling masses of this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the committee rise, so that an order may be made by the House limiting debate on this section.

Several MEMBERS. What limit does the gentleman propose?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. I have an amendment to this section which I desire to propose in good faith. I have notified the Chair of my wish to offer the amendment, and was to be recognized in a few moments. I ask, therefore, that more than fifteen minutes be allowed for the discussion of this question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A number of members desire to offer amendments.

Mr. DIBBLE. I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that the limit be thirty minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Yes; make it thirty minutes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I am willing to accept that suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless by unanimous consent the committee agree to limit debate it will be necessary that the committee rise, so that the House may make an order. Is there objection to limiting debate on this section and amendments thereto to thirty minutes? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Chair suggests that in order to facilitate business it would be well that proposed amendments should be now sent to the desk and read, and the debate of thirty minutes had afterward, so that gentlemen may refer in debate to any of these amendments. If there be no objection that course will be pursued. The Chair hears none, and the Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the second section add:

"And that the sum of $20,000 be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the expenses of such arbitrations; said sum to be available immediately."

Mr. KELLEY. I desire briefly to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize gentlemen to have their amendments read, and then the debate will proceed.

Mr. DIBBLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "act," in the second line, and insert the following:

"Shall have the power of administering oaths and of preserving order during its sittings, shall keep a record of all testimony taken; and upon the conclusion of the examination the members of the board shall certify a written statement of all its proceedings, including such testimony, to the Commissioner of Labor, who shall keep the same on file in his office, and shall furnish two copies thereof, certified by him, free of charge or expense, one to each party concerned in such controversy or difference. Such copies shall be admissible in evidence in every United States court in any action or proceeding between the parties taking part in the examination or in the proceedings herein provided, pre'liminary thereto. In case the Commissioner of Labor deem it necessary to do so, he may detail one or more clerks or stenographers of the Bureau of Labor to assist in the clerical work of the said board. Each of the examiners appointed by the parties shall receive for his services the sum of $5 per day, payable by the United States; and the clerks, stenographers, or special agents of the Bureau of Labor employed in the examination shall each be reimbursed his actual traveling expenses in addition to receiving his usual pay. It shall be the duty of said board to invite proposals for adjustment from each party to the controversy or difference, and to assist in procuring a voluntary settlement of the same by its suggestion and advice; and copies of such proposals, if made by either party, and of any written agreement or agreements entered into between the parties shall be certified to the Commissioner of Labor as a part of the statement of the board at the conclusion of the examination."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] offers the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, section 1, after the word "writings," insert "otherwise than of a confidential or private character."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY] offers the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, after the word "States," insert the following:

"But in no case shall any witness be compelled to disclose the secrets or produce the records or proceedings of any labor organization of which he may be an officer or member."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] offers the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 2 the following:

"That the executive power of the Government shall not be exercised at the instance or in behalf of either party to the controversy, unless the party in whose behalf said interference is asked will agree to submit all questions at issue to an arbitration pursuant to this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] submits the following amendment to the second section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words in the fifth line "punishing for contempt."

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. The committee does not object to my amendment, and I hope by unanimous consent it will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent these amendments have been read for information, and at the close of the thirty minutes' debate they will be presented in their order for action. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. My amendment proposes to give efficiency to powers which this section proposes to confer upon the arbitrators chosen. That is to say, it proposes to appropriate the sum of $20,000, to be available to meet any expenses incurred in accordance with the provisions of this section by such arbitration. It names the sum of $20,000, which I think is moderate, and yet probably will prove to be sufficient. Without some such appropriation this section is mere words and noise, because the arbitrators can not execute the powers given them and support themselves without a fund upon which to draw.

What are those powers which may involve expenditure? They have all the powers and authorities belonging to United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States in respect to administering oaths, subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance, preserving order during the sittings of the board, punishing for contempt, and requiring the production of papers and records.

And in addition to all other powers and privileges in their nature applicable and now possessed and belonging to United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States.

And the said board may appoint a clerk, employ a stenographer, and prescribe all reasonable rules and regulations consistent with the provisions and purposes of this act looking to the speedy advancement to a conclusion and determination of all differences and controversies submitted to them.

Their pay is to be the pay of a United States commissioner, which I believe is $5 a day for each. They are to pay their clerk and stenographer as the circuit court of the United States pays such employés.

Sir, I do not believe these provisions are to expedite the conclusion of arbitration. I am a believer in arbitration as the sole means to settle difficulties between employers and great numbers of employés. But I believe it must be voluntary—that it must result from the conviction of both parties that the circumstances demand adjustment.

Now, when you shall have got three men fixed at salaries at $5 a day invested with the dignity of appointing tipstaves, clerks, and stenographers, summoning witnesses and acting as the equivalents of high judicial functionaries, you will occasionally find—I will not say invariably—that they will be willing to retain their income, their dignity, their power over others as long as it can be conveniently done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DIBBLE. The amendment I have proposed, Mr. Chairman, simply provides that instead of the board of arbitration appointing a clerk and employing a stenographer, which will be an expense to the Government, the Commissioner of Labor shall provide from his office the clerical force that is necessary. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Commissioner of Labor is now employing a chief clerk, one clerk of class 4, one of class 3, one of class 2, and four clerks of class 1, and sixteen special agents. Two of the clerks of class 1 are stenographers, so that my amendment would provide for a more economical administration of the duties of this board.

At the close of this bill, as gentlemen will observe, in the fifth section, all the expenses are to be borne by the United States. My amendment simply proposes we shall utilize those officers now in the employment of the Government under their present pay.

The remaining feature of my amendment is, that it does not contain certain arbitrary powers which add nothing to the efficiency of the board, and which smack of tyrannical interference, beyond what is right and proper, in an investigation having no object but facilitating arbitration or adjustment of controversy.

The powers conferred in the section as presented by the committee, of compulsory attendance of witnesses and of production of books and papers, are extreme powers, which are dangerous to employers and employés alike, outside of a court of justice, where law and precedent guard the sancity of the private business affairs of men and bodies of men from needless exposure, even in the enforcement of public and private rights and the compensation of wrongs by binding decisions—an end not pretended in the present bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Texas desired to offer an amendment.

Mr. CRAIN. I offer the amendments I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 7, after the word "writings," the words "relating alone to the subject under investigation."

Also, strike out the word "and," in line 6, and all the words that follow down to the word "and," in line 9.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I offered has been offered more for the purpose of keeping faith with what I said I would do in my remarks the other day than for the purpose of pressing it upon the action of the committee. Of course I shall not press the amendment now, inasmuch as I am convinced it might impede the progress of the bill; but I have a word that I want to say.

It seems to me that there are two elements which have developed themselves against this bill: The one is the old fogy State-sovereignty fear of anything that looks like national authority. The other is somewhat on the raw-material idea injected by the Anglo-American from New York city. [Laughter.] If he will but reflect that the English system has reference to compulsory arbitration, he will at once see that it is no argument against this bill. Besides, if the slow progress, the misery and the wretchedness, of England are only an example of what their system of arbitration has brought about, it is certainly no argument against this bill either, but appeals more strongly to this Congress to pass something that will do something better than that, or better than they have been able to do, under the theory suggested by the gentleman from New York. As to the State-sovereignty idea, I have yet to hear one argument against the provisions of the bill as it stands. Nothing has been said, no argument has been made against it, no harm is to come—only spooks, apprehensions, something that may "possibly" be the result of introducing that which gives the National Government a right to do that which it has not done.

While acknowledging that in itself it is harmless, these fears are expressed that in some distant future some other Congress may possibly enact something in connection with the subject which may possibly be wrong. That, I repeat, is the only argument against it. I have no such apprehensions.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that if we can do that which will crystallize public opinion we will have taken a step in the right direction, and a gigantic stride. Let me refer you to the great success of the strike in New York city where the carmen struck. They were not successful because of their organization; and when the gentlemen, presuming to represent the special idea of laboring men, say, "We are strong enough to do it ourselves," I tell them you do not understand the situation; you are not strong enough to do it yourselves.

It was not the carmen of New York that gained that victory. It was when the companies attempted to start out a car from the stables it so happened that a coal-cart was dumped on the track beyond which the car could not pass. It so happened that dry-goods clerks and printers sprang out and emptied their crates in the way of the passing car; store-boxes, obstacles of every kind, every impediment was thrown in the way of the passing car. It was not the carmen, therefore, that gained the victory; it was the public sentiment of that great city. It was because New York was opposed to sixteen and seventeen hours a day for the laboring men of that city; and I say that we want no repetition of the late occurrences in Belgium in this country, nor our Pittsburgh riots any more.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, while I shall vote for this bill, it will not be without misgivings as to whether it will prove a benefit to the laboring classes of the country; and surely nobody will pretend that it is or can be a remedy for the evils complained of. I do not understand either, Mr. Chairman, that the intelligent leaders of the labor organizations of the country are asking for this measure. I can hardly think that such leaders as Mr. Powderly, who has shown himself in the late troubles to be a man of great prudence and administrative ability, have asked for or would approve of a bill of this kind, at any rate as a final measure of relief. It is certainly a step outside of anything that has been done before by the General Government.

It is a new departure. For the first time Federal interference is invoked and we ought to consider to what it must lead. The next step doubtless will be to commit the General Government to the policy of protecting railroad property and all agencies of interstate commerce. What will follow this nobody can conjecture. Behind Federal power is the Army, and how soon the bayonet may be thrust forward in support of such power no man can foresee. It is for what may follow that I hesitate to take this step, not for what is in this bill. It may be answered that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," but Homer says, "He is a fool that only sees the mischiefs that are past."

I said I doubted very much whether the intelligent leaders of the labor organizations of the country asked for this legislation. They have asked for a special committee to investigate the troubles now existing in the Southwest; and I wish to have read an extract from a letter from Mr. Powderly to Governor CURTIN, which I now send to the Clerk's desk, urging the appointment of a committee to investigate the troubles in the West.

The Clerk read as follows:

By all means in your power endeavor to have the light of a Congressional investigation thrown upon those men who owe so much to the American people, and who oppress their workmen in the name of law.

You will find a great deal to accomplish in this investigation, and it will do a great deal of good to the people.

You will earn the everlasting gratitude of the working people by pushing this resolution through.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think such an investigation ought to be entered upon at once, and I think it should precede the passage of this bill, and at the proper time I propose to move the reference of this bill to such a committee with instructions to enter at once upon an investigation of the troubles now existing.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The Committee on Labor have acted on this and adopted a similar resolution.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. While I have said what I have respecting this bill, I agree that what it proposes so far as it looks only to arbitration is on the right line, and neither labor nor capital can object to it. But what by itself can it accomplish? is the question. I have believed for many years that the solution of this great problem which is now agitating every civilized country, threatening even the very foundations of the social organism, must be pursued on the line of arbitration and profit-sharing.

The conditions that make this necessary have grown up in the last hundred years. It has grown out of the interdependence of labor and capital. Labor is no longer independent. A hundred years ago laborers had trades and the product of their labor was their wages. Now labor and machinery must work together or not at all. A man has become, for industrial purposes, a part of a machine. But while he owns himself, some one else owns the machine.

Under the old order of things competition controlled everything. But as modern industries are organized the law of competition can not be relied upon alone to determine the wages of labor. And let me say to my free-trade friends right here that this bill, if it passes, will be a legislative declaration that free-trade without correctives can no longer be relied upon for the determination of the rate of wages, or, which is the same thing, the share which labor shall have of what is produced. The doctrine that free competition can be always relied upon to determine the prices of commodities and the wages of labor is the corner-stone of the doctrine of free-trade.

This bill declares that as to wages of labor, at any rate, a corrective to competition shall be applied, and that that corrective shall be arbitration, to determine the share of earnings, or of what is produced by the combined operations of labor and capital, labor shall have.

Under competition alone the price of labor or rate of wages is the result of a struggle between capital and labor, the highest limit being the most capital can afford to pay and have any profit left, and the lowest limit being the smallest sum the laborer can live on. Left to the law of competition alone on the Ricardoan theory, labor itself must in the end fall under the law that determines the price of commodities, namely, the cost of production—the cost of producing labor being at last the bare cost of living. This is what La Salle denounced as the "iron and cruel law," the law of "necessary wages."

The necessary corrective to this law of competition is some adjustment by which labor shall have as its share of what is produced not merely "necessary wages" to sustain life, but its fair share of what is produced by the combined efforts of labor and capital. The law of competition alone, I have said, reduces everything finally to the question, how little can the laborer afford to take, or on how little can he live? The principle of arbitration and profit-sharing asks how much the employer can afford to give?

Labor combinations operate as a corrective agency against the tendencies of the law of competition, but labor combinations alone can result in little more than reducing the lines of competition, and at last to competition between kinds of labor, or between different producing classes. Labor combinations alone, therefore, unless all orders are united as one, can not overcome competition. Professor Hodgson, an advocate of co-operation, says "trade unions are machines of war," while "co-operation is an advance toward peace in the center of the factory." The further corrective of arbitration looking to profit-sharing becomes more and more necessary as capital and labor become more and more dependent on each other, as in the case of great railway lines and their employés.

An eminent economist has said:

Laborers will never benefit to the full from improvements in the productive arts until, by some arrangement or by many arrangements, they are made sharers in industrial capital.

Mill and Cairnes, the two ablest thinkers of the century on this question, reached the same conclusion.

Without this—

Says Professor Cairnes—

the fund available for those who live by labor tends in the progress of society, while growing actually larger, to become a constantly smaller fraction of the entire national wealth.

Again, profit-sharing—that is, sharing in the fund that grows with the growth of wealth—he says, "offers the sole means of escape from a harsh and hopeless destiny;" but adds: "I do not believe this end is to be reached by any direct intervention of the state, which I fear would not only be ineffectual but pernicious."

But whatever may be attempted or done to secure to labor a more equitable share of the produce of combined labor and capital, it should be remembered always that the utmost that can be shared between labor and capital is the annual produce of both. Whatever, therefore, tends to diminish the total productions of a country necessarily reduces both wages of labor and profits on capital.

The quickest way and the only way really to increase wages and profits is to set industries in motion to produce more. Back and behind the question of the division of the annual produce is the question of the quantity of products to be divided.

The depression of business, the stagnation of industries everywhere, lessening productions, and throwing labor "workless on the streets" to starve—the necessary consequence of a shrinking volume of money for the world—is at the bottom of all the labor troubles that have arisen in this or other countries in the last ten years. I do not say that labor has or will, as things have been going on, get a fair share of what is produced, but I do say that nothing will make up for loss of production. The great instrument of industry and commerce itself has become deranged by the demonetization of one of the metals, thereby cutting off the necessary money supply for carrying on the world's vast business.

Nothing will take the place of money in setting the wheels of industry in motion, and no remedy that does not begin with the force that sets all else in motion will prove a cure.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am thankful for a few minutes to make some explanation before the House, as my name has been used by at least two speakers in this debate. I would have liked very much if I could have occupied in the past two days sufficient time of this House to have brought forward in explanation of arbitration proper the reasons that have actuated all the trade unions and labor unions of America, and the means and the methods they have taken to reach arbitration. But I was precluded for some reason, known to this committee or others, from taking that opportunity; and so I let it pass.

I listened with interest to the remarks made this morning by my friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAN]. He and I are the two, and the only two, representatives of skilled labor in this country who hold seats on this floor, the only two entitled to speak here for two great unions of skilled mechanics. And I may say I had the honor to be the chief executive officer of the grandest union of skilled labor America has ever seen—the printers of this country. Now, I wish to say with reference to the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, and the kindly remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that I can not see why skilled unions—I mean the regular trade unions—are directly interested in the legislation proposed by the Committee on Labor. They are in no way interested in it; that is, their membership is not directly touched by it. The enrolled membership of the trade unions, the Knights, and the labor unions of America, as nearly as I can learn from the statistics of one year ago, amounts to possibly 800,000 men. Probably it may be safe to say that half of that number, or 400,000 people, belong to the great organized unions, twenty-one in number.

This bill to which my friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] took exception does not deal with this class of trade unions at all. It simply deals with railroads and the employés of railroads. Consequently what harsh remarks have come from my friend I think came possibly in the heat of debate; and I believe that before this bill is fully considered he will think as I do, that it is not for men like him and myself, who have for thirty years borne the brunt and battle of the trade unionism of America, to put one straw in the way of a bill which, however great its demerits, carries with it popular sentiment, and that sentiment all unionists crave in this land. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If recognized, I will yield my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] has been recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me for a moment? I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have five minutes longer.

Mr. GLOVER. If the Chair will recognize me afterward I will yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] be allowed five minutes longer, not to be included in the thirty minutes.

Mr. CANNON. That is my request.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, that the time for debate be extended for five minutes, and that the extension be granted to the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The organization to which I belong was the first one in this country that instituted arbitration. The first board of arbitrament met in 1856. We have arbitrated all difficult questions during all that time. It is the standing rule of the National Typographical Union that all matters in dispute shall first by the local executive committees be submitted for arbitration. Now, that is an organization where when difficulties occur between proprietors and employés they are measurably technical. It is utterly impossible to take a general board, as proposed, to be appointed by the President, or even to take local arbitrators who are not familiar with the merits of the technical questions involved and the customs and rights of the trade. The rule is, or rather the general custom, that the three arbitrators shall consist of two workmen as against the one who felt aggrieved. The choice has been a business man and two experts, who could pass on what was arbitrated.

Now I wish to say, and I say it frankly, I say it with a knowledge of how my trade is organized and the methods by which we arbitrate, that such a bill as this presented to the printers of the United States and Canada would not be accepted. We have for thirty years paid our own expenses. It has cost in time and wages millions of money to reach the point attained, that the proprietor must arbitrate or the strike comes. We do not intend to invoke statutory enactments while we have the brains and the vantage-ground to place our grievances first before the aggrieved and the board and then before the general public.

In this case, however, it may, and I do hope the bill will, result in good. The three cardinal mainsprings of the movement of the knights are agitate, organize, educate. I believe there are men who know little of trade-unionism, of labor-unionism in America, who will think that the sympathy of the great legislative branch of this country is on their side for fair play, and that this bill will be measurably a conservative line of procedure with men who are not educated up to trade-unionism, and they will accept it as a boon and as a help. [Applause.]

Let me say further, Mr. Chairman, in my own trade the strikes are so few and so insignificant now that arbitration or even striking is hardly known. We have blazed a way for men like the knights and for other great organizations, which are now coequal with us in power. Those organizations are controlled by conservative, brainy, patriotic men, who will never sacrifice the power and the dignity of their organizations to become a mob, seeking for that which is not their inherent right. [Applause.]

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a communication which I have received from one branch of the labor organizations of this country.

The Clerk read as follows:

SAINT LOUIS TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION, No. 8,
Saint Louis, March 28, 1886.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the Saint Louis Typographical Union, held to-day, resolutions were unanimously adopted extending our sympathy and financial aid to the striking employés of the Gould Southwestern lines; expressing confidence in T. V. Powderly's patience, skill, and devotion to the cause of labor, entitling him to the support and sympathy of all friends of the wage-worker; and also the following:

"Resolved, That Congressmen GLOVER and O'NEILL be requested to give their active co-operation to the efforts of Congressman CURTIN to secure a Congressional investigation into the causes which led to the present strike on the Gould Southwestern system of railroads, and that they be further requested to exert their influence in securing such Congressional enactments as will tend to avert strikes and provide for the arbitration of such differences as may arise between employers and employés."

The latter resolution was based on statements published in the papers to the effect that Governor CURTIN had or was about to introduce such a resolution. If he does not introduce it, permit me to urge that you prepare some such proposition, and thus add to the good record which you have already made as a friend of the toiling masses—a record of which you may well feel proud.

Personally, I desire to thank you for several public documents which you have sent to me.

I have the honor to remain, sir, very respectfully, yours,

HUGH T. McMURTRY,
Fin. and Cor. Sec. St. L. T. U., No. 8.

Hon. J. M. GLOVER.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in connection with that communication that I believe half the members of this House are upon a false scent in supposing that labor, organized or unorganized, either desires or will be contented with the sham, the trick, the fraud, the deceit which is embodied in the bill which is now before this House. I say, sir, that there is not to-day a demand from labor in any quarter that is not based and concentrated upon and asking for the adoption of the resolution introduced by the war governor of Pennsylvania.

As to the bill now before the House, it is a constitutional abortion. It has nothing whereon to stand; it has no vote in this House that will not be a vote of supposed expediency, which will be found a great mistake when both sides of this controversy are faced. I denounce it, Mr. Chairman, in the name of capital, because it gives to every roving tramp a commission to take the books of capital and spread them open without cause to the air. I denounce it in the name of labor, because it offers to labor a stone instead of bread; and in the name of the suffering commerce of the whole Southwest section I denounce it as an insult to the intelligence of the merchants of this country and to the workingmen themselves, upon whose credulity and ignorance it is not safe longer to trade.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that the only expression of organized labor that we have had in this House consists in the communication I have just read, and in the resolution of the Knights of Labor sent to my colleague from Missouri, and introduced in my remarks. I desire to say to the gentleman who alluded to the "constitutional cranks" of this House—a gentleman who is well known in certain sections of the country as a baseballist among constitutional lawyers and a constitutional lawyer among baseballists [laughter]—that there is no foundation on which he can stand with his bill. If any apology is needed for the remark I have just made, I find it in the epithet of "constitutional cranks" applied by that gentleman to the leading members of this House in personal weight and influence, and I offer that as my apology to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL]. Mr. Chairman, if I have a moment left, it is to be used for the purpose of enforcing the idea that gentlemen who vote for this bill will find both capital and labor and also the public denouncing their work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] has expired.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

Mr. McCOMAS. Notwithstanding all that has been said in this debate, and all that seems likely to be done with this bill, a few are born to great riches and the many to a poverty made only more grating by the contrast. It has long been and will long hereafter be so. But in the great commercial era in which we live the world has been traveling onward to a new feudality, that of the great capitalists. The tremendous railway development, with its wealth and power, is the most striking form of this new feudalism of wealth, and the masses who come in contact with it are easily tempted to wage war with it.

On the other hand, republican government, parliamentary government, favors naturally the organization of the masses of men to resist, and to make the first fight with the railway corporations, because they have most frequently controlled legislation and habitually seek to influence legislation.

Out of it all has arisen a great labor movement. It promises to be one of the most remarkable movements of modern times. It may cause striking social and economic changes. This agitation is mainly conducted with respect to law and order. To be successful all such agitations must respect the law. I admire the marvelous organizing power of the workingmen of my country, and I rejoice that as the power of organization grows the tendency to conduct in a passionless way the controversies which excite the passions increases. The right of the employés to combine is as clear as the right of the employers to combine. If by this bill we legalize arbitration between employés and railways in interstate commerce, we help bring a moral coercion in favor of arbitration generally.

The controversies between companies and men are always either differences about future contracts, or disagreements respecting present contracts, or quarrels upon some question of sentiment. About these tumult and discontent are easily aroused. Arbitration will help to keep the peace in such cases and ascertain the truth, the facts in controversy. Therefore I am for this bill. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] denounces it because it will do nothing. The eloquent gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is affrighted for fear of its awful consequences. Now, there must be some conservative principle of benefit in a bill thus antagonized on both sides; and I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], because that is the best feature of the bill which he proposes to strike out.

Keep in that clause; allow the arbitrators power to compel the attendance of witnesses and compel them to testify. Let them have clerks and stenographers, that the proceedings may be speedy. Let all this be paid for by the Government; for while the companies can ferret out and carry to the court witnesses from every quarter, the employés who would volunteer to testify and be discharged therefor can be protected by being summoned; and if the money for the hearing and the attendance and travel of witnesses be supplied, the arbitration can proceed on equal terms. The truth is apt to be evolved, and when it is public sentiment will do much.

But I appeal to the House to save this feature of the bill—this machinery and the expense of it to be defrayed by the Government. The money expended will be but a trifle compared with the loss by strikes and disorders.

Then, too, the award, it is said, can not be enforced. It is true; but the decision, the effect of victory, will go with it, and I am willing and ready to try this bill. It may do little, it may do much. This Committee on Labor is criticised. It is not to be expected that it can sweep the whole wide range of our economic life and at once grasp all problems, or in one bill compass even one great problem. What they have offered may do good, and I am sure it can not do harm. I will try it because of the good it may do.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this section and amendments thereto is now closed. The Chair will first submit to a vote of the Committee of the Whole amendments which have been sent to the desk by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], and which, as the Chair understands, have been agreed to by the Committee on Labor this morning.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "writings," in line 6, insert the words "relating alone to the subject under investigation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment, submitted Mr. CRAIN on behalf of the Committee on Labor, was read, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "and all other powers and privileges in their nature applicable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment submitted by Mr. CRAIN on behalf of the Committee on Labor was read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 5, the words "punishing for contempt."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will next read the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the second section down to the word "each," in line 14; the words proposed to be struck out being the following:

"That the board of arbitration provided for in the first section of this act shall possess all the powers and authority in respect to administering oaths, subpœnaing witnesses and compelling their attendance, preserving order during the sittings of the board, and requiring the production of papers and writings relating alone to the subject under discussion, now possessed and belonging to United States commissioners appointed by the circuit court of the United States; and said board of arbitration may appoint a clerk and employ a stenographer, and prescribe all reasonable rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions and purposes of this act, looking to the speedy advancement of the differences and controversies submitted to them to a conclusion and determination."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will next read the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the second section the following:

"That the sum of $20,000 be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the expenses of such arbitrations; said sum to be available immediately."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will next be on the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "act," in second line of printed bill, and insert the following:

"Shall have power of administering oaths and of preserving order during its sittings. It shall keep a record of all testimony taken; and upon the conclusion of the examination the members of the board shall certify a written statement of all its proceedings, including such testimony, to the Commissioner of Labor, who shall keep the same on file in his office, and shall furnish two copies thereof, certified by him, free of charge or expense, one to each party concerned in such controversy or difference. Such copies shall be admissible in evidence in every United States court in any action or proceeding between the parties taking part in the examination, or in the proceedings herein provided preliminary thereto. Each of the examiners appointed by the parties shall receive for his services the sum of $5 per day, payable by the United States, and the clerks, stenographers, or special agents of the Bureau of Labor employed in the examination shall each be reimbursed his actual traveling expenses, in addition to receiving his usual pay. In case the Commissioner of Labor deem it necessary so to do, he may detail one or more of the clerks or stenographers of the Bureau of Labor to assist in the clerical work of the said board. It shall be the duty of the said board to invite proposals for adjustment from each party to the controversy or difference, and to assist in procuring a voluntary settlement of the same by its suggestions and advice; and copies of such proposals, if made by either party, and of any written agreement or agreements entered into between the parties, shall be certified to the Commissioner of Labor as a part of the statement of the board at the conclusion of the examination."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will next be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "writings," in line 6, insert the words "otherwise than of a confidential or private character."

The amendment was rejected; there being—ayes 6, noes 47.

The CHAIRMAN. The next amendment in order is that of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LOWRY], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by inserting after the word "States," in line 9, the words "but in no case shall any witness be compelled to disclose the secrets or produce the records or proceedings of any labor organization of which he may be an officer or member."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will next be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. I withdraw that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The next amendment was that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], to strike out in the fifth line the words "punishing for contempt." Those words have been stricken out by a previous amendment. This completes the amendments at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to amend by striking out in the twelfth line the words "and purposes," which seem to me to be surplusage.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I ask to offer an amendment in the way of a proviso to the second section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2 by adding thereto the following:

"Provided, That before said arbitrators shall act there shall be filed in the clerk's office of the district court of the United States for the district in which said agreement was made a statement signed by the parties, setting forth that the parties named therein have selected arbitrators under this law, and that said arbitrators have selected a third arbitrator, giving the names of said arbitrators and their residences, the nature of the controversy, and the matter or matters to be arbitrated, and thereupon the district judge has entered an order, which order shall be entered within five days after such statement is filed, directing said named persons to proceed to arbitrate said matter or matters under the provisions of this act."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. I move to amend House bill No. 7313 by inserting after the word "stenographer," in line 10 of section 2, the following:

And appoint one or more persons to act as marshals to attend the sessions of said board, who shall be empowered to serve all writs and processes issued by said arbitrators, and be paid as United States marshals are for similar services.

The amendment was disagreed to; there being on a division of the committee—ayes 3, noes 45.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask of the gentleman in charge of this bill how writs and subpœnas are to be served if the bill does not provide some way for doing it?

The CHAIRMAN. That is in the nature of debate, and debate has been closed.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add:

"And appoint some suitable person to serve such writs and processes as may be necessary in the course of said arbitration."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The chairman of the Committee on Labor is under the impression this is provided for in the bill. It is provided that the board may issue a subpœna, but there is no one provided to serve it. I think the gentleman is under a misapprehension in regard to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no further amendment to be offered to the second section the Clerk will proceed to read the third section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of said board of arbitration, immediately upon their selection, to organize at the nearest practicable point to the place of the origin of the difficulty or controversy, and to hear and determine the matters of difference which may be submitted to them in writing by all the parties, giving them full opportunity to be heard on oath, in person and by witnesses, and also granting them the right to be represented by counsel; and after concluding its investigation said board shall publicly announce its award, which, with the findings of fact upon which it is based, shall be reduced to writing and signed by the arbitrators concurring therein, and, together with the testimony taken in the case, shall be filed with the Commissioner of Labor of the United States, who shall make such award public as soon as the same shall have been received by him.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Chairman, the object sought by this legislation is a worthy one, but I fear in the end this bill, if enacted into law, will be like the pope's bull against the comet, it will accomplish nothing. It can accomplish nothing. It does not even pretend to accomplish anything. It simply gives the right of arbitration, and that right, we all of us know, is a common-law right, to which all citizens can resort when so disposed. The proposed legislation does not even go as far as the common law, for under that law the disputants were accustomed to enter into bonds in advance to obey the award. In this bill there is no provision to compel an arbitration and no provision to enforce the award if one should be made. What good then can the bill do?

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Labor might have brought into this House a more fruitful measure, one that would have done something practical toward ameliorating the condition of the industrial classes. The times are sadly out of joint. Thousands of able and willing men are out of work. Labor and capital are at swords' points. A cry of distress is heard throughout the land. It has reached the floor of this House. The cry was for bread, and the Committee on Labor has given them a stone.

Mr. Chairman, a physician skilled in his profession never doctors symptoms. He directs his treatment to the disease. If he can remove the cause, the effect disappears. Why should not we follow the same plan in treating this labor question? Strikes are but symptoms. The disease is behind them. This bill simply proposes to deal with the symptoms. Why not look into the disease? Why not inquire into those antecedent conditions which lead up to strikes?

It may be that when we investigate the relations between capital and labor and the conditions upon which labor demands higher wages and the pretexts resorted to by capital in refusing them, we will find some practical solution of this difficult problem.

Let us look for a moment at the class against which this bill is directed. It is aimed, according to its title, at "common carriers"—that is, the great railroad corporations. How have these corporations been formed? Originally by charters from the several States through which the roads ran. They were at first the creatures of the State. But eventually, with the expansion of commerce, it was found necessary for convenience and economy of transportation to consolidate various lines under one management. And here, mark you, in these consolidation agreements is where the real trouble began. A road would be gobbled up under foreclosure sale at—say two millions of dollars—and turned into the new company at ten millions. This scheme has been resorted to time and again, and to such an extent that I think I am safe in saying the railroads of the country are to-day capitalized at twice their value. In other words, their stock is so watered that it is half milk and half water. What next? The managers of these roads insist upon running them so as to get a dividend not only on the milk but also on the water. To do this they plunder shippers and passengers by charging excessive rates. The employés must help them out, and so they are put on starvation wages. The poor brakeman, the conductor, the fireman, and the engineer get a scant pittance, while the president draws a salary of $50,000 a year.

Reduce the capital of these roads to its actual cost and value—get rid of the water—do away with the excessive salaries paid the officers and managers, and they would be able to pay their employés satisfactory wages and we would hear of no further strikes.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are other conditions which tend to bring about strikes, and over which this House has control. I refer to proper legislation on the tariff and currency question. These two questions exert a very marked and strong influence upon the relations of labor to capital. To say that capital is sensitive is to say what we all know full well. It is shy and cautious and wary of investment. To-day the capitalist is hoarding his money. He will not embark in enterprise or business. And why? Mainly because of the unsatisfactory condition of the currency question. He will not loan or invest from fear that his money will be returned to him in a depreciated currency. Lord Bacon said that money was like manure—if lying in a heap it was of no good, but when spread on the fields it was of great value. If the money now withheld from investment throughout the country could be put in circulation employment for the poor would at once spring up, and all that is necessary to liberate this hoarded money is for Congress to give assurance, as it can, that the Government will coin nothing but honest money and keep its faith with the public creditors. The evil can not be cured, as my friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] suggests, by increasing the volume of currency. The proper remedy is to increase the public credit. Confidence by capitalists in the stability and honesty of the currency is what will cause them to unlock their coffers and embark their money in manufactories and other enterprises.

Then the tariff plays an important part in this vital question. We hear of mills shut down and manufactories closed all over the country. Why? Because there is no sale for their manufactures. You must not expect a man to manufacture goods when he can find no market for them. He closes his factory, and hundreds of hands are thrown out of employment. Now, if he had a wider market for his goods, if he could send them to the markets of the world, he would keep his factory going and his hands at work. But he can not do this because of the high tariff on the materials out of which he manufactures. Put raw materials on the free-list, and with American machinery and the superior dexterity of American artisans he could compete successfully with the manufacturers of any country on the face of the earth.

Mr. Chairman, these are a few only of the questions which are well deserving of the serious attention of the Committee on Labor. I have not time to enlarge upon them. I can only hint at them in the limited time allowed by this debate. But if we would do something in the true interests of the laboring man, we should lose no time in considering these important matters.

I have no confidence in the bill before us. It will accomplish nothing, as I have said before; and yet I shall vote for it for the same reasons as those given by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]. It can do no harm, but may possibly do some good. In addition, I may say, the passage of the bill will be in the nature of a notice to capital that now and hereafter it must respect the reasonable demands of organized labor, so far at least as this House is concerned. [Applause.]

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Chairman, I have not had the time to consider the great question involved in this bill with that deliberation which its importance demands. It is so deep and so far-reaching as to call for the most thoughtful consideration and most deliberative judgment of this House. I yield to no man in my desire to see some satisfactory solution of this vexed question, and no greater fame should be desired by any legislator than to successfully grapple with it, and devise means by which the contentions between labor and capital can be peaceably settled and the immense business interests of this country protected against the oft-recurring troubles through which they are now passing.

I yield to no man in my regard for the horny-handed son of toil, or for him who eats his daily bread through the sweat of an honest brow. I yield to no man in my sympathy for the toiling millions who are struggling under the heel of giant corporations and oppressive monopolies. My heart goes out to them in their unequal contest. I wish I could devise means for their relief, and put them upon a plane where they could assert their rights against the encroaching power of money-kings and grasping cormorants. I wish I could lay my hand upon the men who sit enthroned upon crushed hopes and bleeding hearts, upon the piles of glittering wealth secured by the deprivation of their fellow-man of his just rights, and command them to "do unto others as they would have others to do unto them."

I wish I possessed the power, not to wrest capital from the hands of its owners, but to require the possessor to return to the brain and muscle which enabled him to fill his coffers the fair and equitable share of that brain and muscle.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am endowed with neither this ability nor power; and while I would not detract from the individual ability of the distinguished members of this body, I do not believe there is any single mind here able to solve the difficulty and lead us out of the labyrinth of troubles in which we find ourselves. But I do believe that in the combined wisdom of this House a remedy could be found, and that in the multitude of minds the wrongs which cry aloud for relief could be redressed.

As yet, however, my eyes can not see and my understanding fails to comprehend anything in the bill under discussion which will bring relief or give redress.

What does the bill propose? Simply that whenever common carriers and their employés have differences or controversies they may, if they please, submit the differences or controversies to arbitration. Only this and nothing more. In a word, Congress by a solemn act is to declare that the parties may do a thing which they have the absolute right to do regardless of Congressional action. Well, when they shall have done that which they have the right to do without Congressional authority and the arbitrators shall have made their award, what force and effect will the award have? None; for there is no provision for enforcing it, and it remains without any binding or legal force, and compliance with it rests alone in the pleasure of the parties themselves. No power is conferred, and the redress of no wrong is insured.

With due deference, I must say that this bill looks to me like trifling with a great question and dallying with the laboring interests of this country. I assume, sir, that there is too much intelligence in the labor organizations and among the laboring classes generally not to see through the flimsy gauze thrown over this bill by its high-sounding title. I assume that the men who have been seeking aid at the hands of their Representatives here will read and understand for themselves that Congress would declare, should this bill pass, that no remedy could be afforded and no means of redress given them. Yet, sir, that at the same time they would be impressed with the idea, whether correctly or not, that this House presumed upon their ignorance, and thought they would be satisfied with a stone when they were asking for bread.

In my opinion a vote for this bill is in effect a vote against labor. It will be a vote in favor of nothing, absolutely nothing, in the interest of the toiler. It will be a vote in favor of no other legislation of its character, and will suppress, for the present at least, any and all other bills for the elevation of labor and the amelioration of the unhappy condition of the laboring classes of our people.

Now, sir, there is one other feature of this bill to which I want to refer briefly. Though no right is conferred and the parties act according to their own pleasure in submitting to arbitration and abiding by the award, we are to have all over the country, wherever a railroad, canal, or other common carrier may run or transact business and differences or controversies arise, boards of arbitration, clerks, and stenographers, "all to be paid out of the public Treasury."

There is no mind so penetrating as to fathom the depth to which these expenses may reach; there is no eye so keen as to see the length and breadth over which these investigations may spread. A field rich in fees and emoluments will open up and a harvest will be reaped by arbitrators, clerks, stenographers, and witnesses, with no tangible results. I have heard some gentlemen give as the reason for their support of the bill that it could do no harm. My objection to it is that it will do no good, that it will accomplish nothing. The framers of it remind me of the story of the old farmer who had some heavy butts of logs on his land, and when a neighbor saw him plowing the field without removing the logs, and inquired why he did not remove them, he received the reply from the old fellow "that they were too infernal heavy to roll, too darned soggy to burn, and too tarnal tough to split, so he had concluded just to plow around them." So with the framers of this bill: the question was so gigantic in its proportions, they left it where they found it and just plowed around it.

But is this character of legislation in keeping with the dignity of the Congress of a great people? Have not the commercial and business interests now suffering, and which have suffered continuously for years, either from suspension of trade or fear of it, to say nothing about the interest of labor, the right to expect something tangible and not invisible, something affirmative and not negative, something solid and not empty? Harmless! Yes, it will be harmless in the sense that it will be worth no more than the paper upon which it may be printed so far as settling differences. Nobody will be benefited but the retinue of officials which it will create. Harmless! No, it will not be harmless so far as drafts upon the public Treasury are concerned.

Sir, as a Representative upon this floor, I would be unworthy of the noble constituency I represent if by my vote I were to authorize the expenditure of the people's money with less consideration than I would expend my own private funds. I would not incur the expense of an arbitration of differences between me and my neighbor unless the award could be enforced, unless it would settle our differences and end our disputes; and as I would not do this as an individual out of my own private purse, I will not by my vote as a Representative do it out of the public purse.

Sir, I would have been pleased to see the Committee on Labor, in the combined wisdom of its members, or this House, in the multitude of its minds, devise some means to meet the demands of the hour, and I shall yet hope for some such measure. I shall vote against this bill, because its only result will be to draw money from the Treasury. I shall vote against it, believing, as I do, that the passage of such a bill will be unworthy of the Congress of a people who boast of their statesmanship and their ability to grapple with weighty questions, their sense of justice and feeling of humanity, their regard for honest labor, and their disposition to elevate it to that plane ordained by God himself when he commanded that bread should be the reward of sweat and toil.

I shall vote against it as a measure which ought to be condemned by all classes, except by those whose millions have been hoarded up by oppression and whose dividends have been drawn by grinding the helpless; by powerful corporations and mighty monopolies, who upon the plea of being public benefactors have secured peculiar privileges and divested private rights, and then with an iron rod have domineered over their employés and with an iron heel have walked with despotic stride over those whose hands were making them rich. It will suit them, because "harmless" and barren of results. Sir, the strong can take care of themselves; they need no protection. The weak require support. I am for the weak as against the strong. I am for the toiler as against the monopolist. At the same time I shall endeavor to hold evenly the scales and mete out exact justice, but shall resolve all doubts in favor of the weak and not the strong.

In recording my vote against this bill, I shall do it as I believe in the interest of the laboring man, whose intelligence and powers of discernment will lead him to realize that when he reaches for the substance he will find the shadow; and it will be in the interest of the tax-payers of this land, whose hard earnings are to be taken to pay newly created officials in investigations which will result in nothing and end in a farce. [Applause.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I think the Committee on Labor has done very wisely and well in reporting this bill, and I believe that under the circumstances surrounding them, as well as the necessities of the case, they could not have gone much further or done much better than they have done. I have no doubt whatever of the constitutionality of the measure. The power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations is a broad and comprehensive grant of power, and I feel quite certain that in the exercise of this power Congress can enact a law that will promote commerce between the States and control the railroads of the country in carrying out that law.

I was surprised, sir, at the position assumed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] with reference to this bill, especially when I remember that he has proposed a bill for the regulation of interstate commerce, which embraces broader provisions than does this bill; and yet the interstate-commerce bill he does not regard as unconstitutional. I regard that bill to which he refers as entirely constitutional, but I must confess that I was exceedingly surprised to find the gentleman from Texas raising the question of constitutionality about a measure of this character, when he has himself proposed a bill here, known as House bill No. 5885, to incorporate by an act of Congress of the United States a ship-railway corporation to operate in a dominion foreign to the Government and beyond the jurisdiction of the flag of the United States. I do not think that a gentleman who proposes a bill of that character has very much right to criticise the liberal constitutional ideas of anybody else.

This bill may amount to very considerable in the direction it is intended to go and it may not amount to very much, as has been already very well stated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], but at all events it should have a fair and impartial trial. There is certainly one thing about it which will not be denied, and that is it will secure an examination into a controversy where parties consent that an examination shall be had, and the expense of that examination will be borne by the United States. If, therefore, it does no more, it will secure an investigation which may be had where witnesses can be subpœnaed, their testimony taken, and thus the truth arrived at by that investigation as between the parties to the controversy.

But, sir, I warn the laboring men of this country not to put their reliance in legislation. Legislation can not cure all the evils complained of. There is no element in human character, there is no attribute of human nature that can achieve success, that leads forward to prosperity, or that will accomplish great results so much as a determined self-reliance; and I fear very much when either the capital or labor of this country shall look to legislation alone for support, shall look to legislation with a view to aiding them in any controversy, when self-reliance and their own purposes would secure the better results—I say I fear very much that legislation of that character instead of promoting the good purpose intended to be promoted will be more apt to thwart and defeat the very purposes contemplated.

I commend to the workingmen of this country, whose strength is well known, whose organizations are reaching everywhere, and who have power and manhood and good sense to assert and maintain their rights, that they should not depend upon legislation to cure the evils they complain of, but depend upon their own good judgment, upon their own good sense, and in the end they will achieve more than by any legislation which the American Congress can enact. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments to it be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. LORE. I hope that will not be done.

The CHAIRMAN. There are other sections of the bill, and of course this will not prevent debate upon them.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. ROGERS. I object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let me send up an amendment to the desk to have it read for information. I do not want to make a speech.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Certainly; send it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that amendments may be read which are proposed to be offered to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done afterward; the committee has determined to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the labor-arbitration bill, had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the arbitration bill; and pending that I move that debate upon the third section of the bill and all amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes; and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think if the gentleman will limit this debate to twenty minutes, perhaps there would be no objection.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Ten minutes is enough. I do not desire to make a speech myself.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it would facilitate matters to give twenty minutes.

Mr. LORE. I move to amend by making it twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman has demanded the previous question.

Mr. HAMMOND. It has not been ordered.

The SPEAKER. It is pending, however, and an amendment is not in order pending the demand. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to limit debate to ten minutes was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House debate upon this section and all amendments thereto is limited to ten minutes. The Chair will first cause the Clerk to read such amendments as may be proposed to this section.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, as follows:

Add to the third section the following:

"And if either of said parties, or any one or more of them, fail or refuse to abide or perform the same, the said award may be presented by said board of arbitrators or other person interested therein to the district or circuit court of the United States for the district where the said controversy arose, or where the award was made, and the same shall be made of record and the said board shall report therewith the costs and expenses of said arbitrament, and judgment therefor shall be given by said court against said refusing party or parties, and collected as other judgment, and the sum recovered shall be paid into the Treasury."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the third section by inserting in line 10, after the word "award," the following: "And shall also furnish each party with a copy of said award."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be further amendments to be proposed to this section they can be sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think it has been settled by the constitutional lawyers that this bill is strictly within the constitutional power of the legislative branch of the Government. I do not, therefore, propose to discuss it.

The fifth section provides that the expense of this arbitration, including the presence or attendance of witnesses, shall be paid by the United States. The amendment that I propose is simply this, that in the event either of the parties submitting to the arbitrament refuses to abide it, the award shall be reported to the district or circuit court for the district where it has been made or where the controversy arose, and that with it shall be also a statement of the costs and expenses incurred therein, and that judgment shall be given by that court against the party failing or refusing to abide the result. And as the fees are paid in all instances out of the Treasury of the United States, the amendment provides that the sum recovered shall be paid into the Treasury.

It seems to me this amendment should be adopted. It will give some vitality to this measure, and will afford some reason, some controlling influence, that may secure the acquiescence of the parties who have submitted to the arbitration. In order to give the bill this efficiency, or so little as may be given by the proposed amendment, I have offered it.

As it is not proposed to compel the parties to abide the result by a judgment of any court having power to enforce it, we might provide at at least that the parties who have invoked the power of this tribunal to settle a controversy and then refuse to abide the award should reimburse the Government of the United States for the expenses that have been incurred in the attempt to settle the controversy.

Mr. LORE. The amendment I have offered to the third section is that a certified copy of the award shall be furnished to each party to the controversy. Certainly each party should know and have the award. I may frankly say even if this amendment were adopted I could not support this bill. Its friends have admitted on this floor that it amounts to nothing but a resolution, a declaration on the part of this Congress that arbitration ought to be resorted to by the parties in all such controversies. A resolution would effect that purpose and would be open and surely not a pretense.

But, sir, we have here in promise a bill which undertakes speedily to settle disputes between railroads and their employés. It provides no persons to serve a summons, no means to carry any award or finding into effect. Promises largely, threatens bravely, but accomplishes nothing, except the expenditure of public money and another list of officials to be paid out of the Federal Treasury. It provides complicated and expensive machinery. It gives the arbitrators power—if called upon to go through the form of a legal trial—to summons witnesses before them and to punish for contempt with absolutely no means of reaching the witnesses. Then it provides that an award shall be made in writing and that award shall be published. And when thus made and published and when the evidence is all collected, what then? We ask, cui bono?

Why, sir, after this publication the award and evidence are to be sent to the Commissioner of Labor and the award is to be published again. And what next? Then it is to be filed away among the records of the Bureau of Labor. For what? Possibly, when the antiquarian shall look for the legislation of this Republic in years to come, to be preserved there as the very best specimen of that class of legislation which keeps the word of promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope.

There is conceded nothing substantial in this bill. No legal determination can be reached by it. It is a mere declaration that we should resort to arbitration. Labor is effecting that very purpose now by most patient means. By organizations, drilled and educated to meet organized capital, it elsewhere compels arbitration. The leaders in this labor movement propose to educate the labor unions. As has been stated, like organizations in England are thus drilled and educated. They have the power, and it matters little though the railroad wealth of the country be united in the hands of four men, as claimed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS], it will soon be seen that these four men are in the hands of labor, organized in the way that capital has been heretofore organized, for its own protection.

Pass this bill, and you place in the hands of those four men the power to direct legislation against labor in the same manner they have thus far absorbed great franchises, parts of the sovereignty of the people, into their hands. Look at the results of that legislation in the past. Little by little, but as certainly as fate, the power, the land, the wealth of the nation have been gradually and by means of legislation centered in the hands of a few men.

If this be so, why adopt such a dangerous course—legislation like this bill, which you concede is toying with the gravest question of the hour? It may be the entering-wedge, ay, sir, the initial step in the course by which these corporations may accomplish their ends and do with labor just what they have done with your railroads, your public lands, your franchises, and your national wealth. Concentrated capital has provoked organized labor. Admit that these corporations may invoke Federal legislation in strikes and in the effort of labor to protect itself; under the guise of aiding labor you furnish the means of crushing it also. You will find legislation uniformly yielding to the subtlety and ability of those whom three or four men of immense wealth and power, the representatives of these huge monopolies, may bend to their purpose.

The scattered masses are unable to cope with such concentrated energy, wealth, and subtlety, and must fall back upon public sentiment at last. I am willing, sir, to vote for anything that will benefit labor, but I am not willing that this mockery, this sham shall go out to the workingmen of this land promising them a "speedy settlement" of the disputes between labor and capital, while its advocates well know that it lacks every element of efficiency. Labor wants compulsory arbitration. You offer them public sentiment. That they have already. The workingmen understand this question and will not be satisfied with a delusion. Let us have the courage of our convictions and vote as we think.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LORE. I would do so, but my time is up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate upon this section is exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the next section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be the right of any employés engaged in the controversy to appoint, by designation in writing, one or more persons to act for them in the selection of an arbitrator to represent them upon the board of arbitration.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend by striking out the last word of this section.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section be limited to five minutes.

Mr. GLOVER. I object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to agree to ten minutes.

Mr. GLOVER. I object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate upon this section.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to move to limit debate upon this section until debate upon it has been had. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOWARD] is recognized.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that gentlemen in the discussion of this subject have drifted away from the real issue. If this were a question as to the merits of arbitration, it would be well to discuss that subject. But that is not the point in controversy. Is that the question we are called upon to consider here to-day? Is the question presented in this bill for the consideration of this House whether arbitration between the opposing forces that are agitating the country is a proper method of settlement or otherwise? I take it that that is not the question. This bill bears upon its face evidence that the gentlemen who framed it do not regard that as the issue involved. What then is the question? Is it not whether Congress has the power to control the subject of disputes between railroad companies and other corporations and their employés? The bill on its face admits that its framers did not believe in the existence of such power.

Now, Congress either has the power or it has not. If it possesses the power then I am opposed to the bill, because it does not deal with the subject in earnest. It dodges the question. It professes to relieve the labor of the country when it does not give a single right not already possessed. There is not a laborer in all the country but knows that the right to arbitrate his difficulties and disputes by consent have always existed. There is no element in this bill that enlarges the rights of any one in the matter with which it proposes to deal, not one. Then, on the other hand, if this Congress has not the power to interpose by compulsory arbitration in these matters of dispute has it the power to legislate to the extent proposed in this bill? If you can take the one step why can you not take the other, and will any man on this floor undertake to say that Congress has the power to enforce compulsory arbitration in these cases?

If any man will claim that such power exists it will make an issue between us; but this bill does not involve that question; it evades it, and does so for a purpose. The friends of the measure claim that it is a step in the right direction; that it is the best they can do; that it affords all the relief that Congress has a right to grant. If we vote for this bill on the ground that it is a step in the right direction, that vote will be construed as a recognition of the right to take another step in the same direction. When and under what circumstances may we be called upon to take that other step? Who can say but that before this session of Congress closes these railroad companies will be seeking legislation authorizing the Federal Government to send armed forces into any State in the Union, when there may be a strike, to arrest the strikers, take them for trial before a Federal court, away from their homes and friends? What will you men who vote for this bill then say when thus importuned to take a second and further step upon the subject, as to the power of Congress to interfere in these disputes?

Now, let us be honest, and meet these questions involved in this bill like men. Let us by our votes now give the whole country, railroad companies and other corporations and their employés, to understand that Congress is not the proper forum in which to adjust their disputes and grievances. Let us try and gain the confidence of our constituents, not by sham and delusive legislation but by such legislation as will relieve the labor and industries of the country from the burdens of high and unnecessary taxation. Let our legislative enactments be such as will give equal and exact justice to all and exclusive privileges to none. Let us refuse to interfere with the coinage of silver as now authorized by law. Let us take no step which will tend to appreciate money and depreciate property, and thus increase the burdens and bring ruin upon the great debtor class of this country that are and have for years been struggling to pay their debts and save their property and homes from confiscation.

Let us invoke the best statesmanship in this Congress in behalf of such measures as may best tend to open the markets of the world for the surplus products of our farmers and manufacturers. Let us repeal or modify all existing laws the tendency of which is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. Then indeed will strikes disappear from our country, and every idle man find employment at remunerative prices, and peace, contentment, and happiness will be found in every household in all the borders of our land. The present situation of our country imperatively demands that something should be done to ameliorate the condition of the toiling millions, who, as it has been so well said by another, are our country's brightest ornaments in times of peace and greatest bulwark in times of war.

It has been said that man only needs to know his true interest in order to pursue it. What, then, is the true interest of the laboring masses? Perhaps it were easier to tell what are not their true interests. If I were called upon for advice, I would say to the labor of the country never to invoke the exercise of unwarranted powers even in your own behalf, for if such powers can be used to aid you they can be used to crush you; remember that this Government is one of limited powers and that all its just powers are derived from the consent of the governed, and that all governmental power is an infringement upon natural right, and that there is an eternal conflict between power and the rights and privileges of the people, and wherever it has been waged power has gained the mastery. Hence the safety of the people and the perpetuation of our form of government depend upon a strict observance of those limitations of power on behalf of their public servants.

Had those limitations been observed in the past there would have been no class legislation, concentrating the wealth of the country in the hands of the few at the expense of the many. It is only by a species of usurpation that such results have been reached. The tendency of the times is to centralization, which means more power in the Government and less in the people. The people should promptly repel all legislation which tends to recognize the doctrine that the Government is master and the people its servants. All those measures asking the Government to interfere with the private affairs of the people are but so many lessons in that direction. History informs us that free governments are not usually overthrown by bold and open assault, but by insidious approaches, coming always under the guise of some great good; power says to the people, "Let us take this step, although it intrenches upon your reserved rights; the end justifies the means." We should remember that this step taken invites another and another, until, in the language of Justice Story, while this form of the Government remains the spirit will have departed. The capability of man for self-government is now being put to the test. My advice to the laborers of the country is to do nothing but what is right and submit to nothing that is wrong, for every step you take in the wrong direction will be magnified and distorted and will be used by your adversaries as an argument against your capacity for self-government. Standing upon this high plane of citizenship and duty, you would have the sympathy of the whole country, and every man who loves liberty and his country will defend your cause, and no power on earth can prevail against you.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I now move that the committee rise, so that the House may close debate on this section.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to occupy five minutes before he presses that motion?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I have asked unanimous consent to close debate and objection has been made. If consent is given to close debate in five minutes, I am willing the gentleman from Texas should occupy that time.

Mr. GLOVER. I object.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of House bill 7479; and pending that motion I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the fourth section of the bill and all amendments thereto be limited to five minutes. On this motion I call the previous question.

Mr. GLOVER. Pending that motion, I move the House now take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to inquire whether it is the purpose of the gentleman from Missouri to have a vote on this bill to-night.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is our intention to get a vote on the bill as soon as we can.

The motion of Mr. GLOVER for a recess was not agreed to; there being—ayes 43, noes 145.

The previous question was ordered on the motion of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, to limit debate; and under the operation of the previous question the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of the controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto is limited to five minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I propose only to make a brief observation in reply to the remarks made a short time ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] and similar remarks made by another gentleman yesterday. Those gentlemen expressed surprise that, as I had advocated and voted for a bill to regulate interstate commerce, I could not vote for the bill now before the House. I might return the compliment and express my surprise that a gentleman of the experience of my friend from Pennsylvania should not be able to understand the difference between a measure regulating commerce between the States and a bill which undertakes to regulate contracts made by parties engaged in commerce between the States with some outside parties about some matters not connected with railroad transportation.

Mr. BAYNE rose.

Mr. REAGAN. I beg the gentleman will not consume any part of my five minutes. The gentleman also expressed his astonishment that I should object to this bill after having reported from the Committee on Commerce a bill proposing the incorporation of a company to build a ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. The gentleman may understand the Constitution and may understand Democracy better than I do; but President Polk was considered as belonging to the straitest sect of State-rights and strict-construction Democrats, and during his administration in 1848 he, through Mr. Buchanan, his Secretary of State, offered on behalf of the United States $15,000,000 for the privilege of constructing a ship-transit across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Now, what the Government can do itself, it surely can incorporate another to do.

The gentleman made the point that the purpose of the corporation contemplated by my bill was to be carried out in a foreign country. Why, sir, the Mexican Central Railroad has been built under a charter from the State of Massachusetts. The Southern Pacific Railroad has been built under a charter from the State of Kentucky. A number of other charters of the same kind have been granted for the building of railroads extending into the territory of Mexico.

Mr. BAYNE rose.

Mr. REAGAN. I beg the gentleman will not take any part of my time. The gentleman may say that the proposition in this case was to grant a charter from the United States Government. But what is the difference? If the United States can regulate the commerce between the States and with foreign nations—if it could build a ship-transit across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, or, adopting another mode, could pay a company for carrying its mails, its ships, its troops and munitions of war across the isthmus, can it not, exercising the same power under which the Pacific railroad was constructed, with the assent and support of the ablest Democrats in America, incorporate a company for the purpose contemplated by the bill which I reported?

I do not propose to argue this question now; but I did not wish to sit by and hear two gentlemen successively try to reproach me for doing what the ablest and best Democrats in America have proposed to do.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for debate has expired.

The Chair understands that a number of formal amendments have been offered to this section; and they will be considered as withdrawn. The Clerk will report the next section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That each member of said tribunal of arbitration, and the clerk, stenographer, and witnesses attending before them, shall be entitled to receive like fees or compensation as United States commissioners, and clerks, stenographers, and witnesses attending before United States commissioners; and such fees or compensation shall be payable by the United States in like manner as fees of such United States commissioners, and witnesses before such United States commissioners, in criminal causes, are payable under existing laws.

Mr. O'HARA. I move to strike out the last word.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that this bill came up in the House before the members thereof had time to consider it. I have not given the bill that consideration I desired to give to it, and yet I am in favor of it, believing it is a step in the right direction.

It is an earnest, at least on the part of the House of Representatives, to the laboring men of this country that they are in favor of assisting them in settling their difficulties by arbitration.

It has been said, and well said, upon this floor that the spirit of our civilization is strongly pointing toward settling not only difficulties between capital and labor, but all differences between nations by arbitration. I represent, Mr. Chairman, a constituency upon this floor composing a large class of unorganized labor, but which must in the very near future be organized for its own protection; and in its clash with other great interests which it must meet, it regards as earnest this sentiment of arbitration receiving its expression here, so that when the time comes when it shall clash with other interests that sentiment will have gone forth to the country and arbitration may be called upon to settle that great difficulty.

When that time comes then I shall expect to hear great constitutional lawyers here get up and invoke the shades of the Constitution; but, thank God, the spirit of the times will say to these gentlemen that the Constitution is broad enough and strong enough to allow the Congress of the United States to step in and assist the people in their difficulties by arbitration.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who are afraid that we are going to retrograde; that this great movement which is now on foot, this settling of difficulties between labor and capital, because we pass this bill, will retrograde, as has been said by the gentleman from New York. Nor am I afraid that the great spirit of liberty will be crushed out because so asserted by the gentleman from Kentucky.

But however much I may be in favor of this bill, Mr. Chairman, I must protest, in the name of the ignorant, the unlettered people of these United States, against the innuendoes thrown out by the friends of this measure that we are for taking $77,000,000 of the people's money for the purpose of educating a certain class.

I say that is a false idea. That seventy-seven millions when taken from the Treasury of the United States will return in bounties fifty-fold. It will be for the education not of a certain class of people, but for all the people of these United States; and, sir, it will be one of the greatest levers that can be used to bring about a settlement between these two mighty interests, labor and capital. It will educate the laborer of the country to that extent that he will be enabled to maintain his rights within the law. It will enable him to justly appreciate such settlement as may be made by arbitration, and thus tend to elevate the entire masses of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] is recognized.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I move to strike out, in the fifth section of the bill, all after the word "arbitration," in the second line, and insert what I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has responded and sent an amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That is all right. Let the amendment be pending.

I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 120, noes 8.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the labor-arbitration bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the House take a recess until twenty-five minutes after 7 o'clock this evening, the object being to perfect and pass this bill to-night if possible.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to amend the motion by making it half past 7 o'clock, for the purpose of considering pension bills.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like consent of the House to make a suggestion. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

This bill has been amended in many important particulars, and I suggest to the gentleman in charge of it that he permit the bill as amended to be printed in the RECORD, and that it be taken up to-morrow for final disposition. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] There is not a man here who can describe the bill as it has been amended.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 80, noes 72.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I demand tellers.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask that the question be stated. There is evidently a misapprehension as to what we are voting upon.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock, to consider pension bills under the previous order of the House.

The question is on ordering tellers.

Tellers were refused—21 members only voting therefor.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the motion as amended.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My desire was to make a suggestion in the interest of harmony. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia having prevailed, I again ask unanimous consent that the bill as amended be printed in the RECORD. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion as amended.

The question being taken, the motion as amended was agreed to—ayes 96, noes 76.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I give notice that I will move to-morrow to set aside the special order for that day in order to proceed with this bill.

The result of the vote was announced; and the House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) took a recess until half past 7 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past 7 p. m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar under the special order, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills granting pensions reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that members present be allowed to call up bills out of their order. I do so in order that gentlemen who take the trouble to come here at the evening session may be favored with the passage of their bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that gentlemen may be recognized to call up any bill on the Private Calendar that comes within the rule. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

WILLIAM FIELD.

Mr. ELY. I call up the bill (H. R. 4808) granting a pension to William Field.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William Field, late a private in Company A, Thirty-ninth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $25 per month from the passage of this act.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions with the following amendment:

In line 7, strike out "$25" and insert "$12."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN G. BURRILL.

Mr. MATSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 5583) granting a pension to John G. Burrill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of John G. Burrill, late first lieutenant of Company G, Fourteenth Indiana Volunteers, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN ARTHUR.

Mr. ELLSBERRY. I call up the bill (H. R. 5058) granting a pension to John Arthur.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the pension laws, the name of John Arthur, late of Company K, One hundred and sixtieth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ADALINE M. PUTNAM.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call up the bill (S. 814) granting a pension to Mrs. Adaline M. Putnam.

The bill was read, as follows

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Adaline M. Putnam, mother of the late Haldimand Sumner Putnam, late colonel of the Seventh New Hampshire Volunteers, at the rate of $50 per month.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions with the following amendment:

In line 8 strike out "$50" and insert "$30."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment recommended by the committee will be adopted, and the bill as amended will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PRICE. There is objection. I oppose the proposition.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 814) granting a pension to Mrs. Adaline M. Putnam, submit the following report:

This committee adopts the report of the Senate committee, which is hereto appended, as a fair statement of this claim. We recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "fifty," in the seventh line, and inserting the word "thirty," and that as so amended the bill do pass.

The claimant is Mrs. Adaline M. Putnam, mother of the late Haldimand Sumner Putnam, late colonel of the Seventh New Hampshire Volunteers. Colonel Putnam was killed at the head of his regiment in the assault on Fort Wagner. He was one of the most able and skillful officers of his rank, and but for his untimely death would have undoubtedly achieved very high distinction in the service. As appears from the evidence, while living he contributed to the support of his parents, and his aged mother is now left in distress for the necessaries of life.

The following statement, under oath, of Mrs. Putnam is adopted by the committee as a full and fair statement of the facts of this case. It seems unjust, and if unjust impossible, to deny an application of so great merit. Senator EVARTS, Hon. Hosea W. Parker, of New Hampshire, formerly member of the House of Representatives, and other gentlemen of the highest character, who have personal knowledge in regard to the facts in this case, have urged upon your committee that this pension be granted, Mrs. Putnam is now seventy-five years of age and suffering for the necessaries of life. It is fairly within the scope of previous action of Congress to allow her claim, and your committee recommend the passage of the bill:

"I, Adaline M. Putnam, of Cornish, county of Sullivan and State of New Hampshire, make oath, depose, and say as follows:

"That I am the widow of John L. Putnam, late of said Cornish, deceased. That my husband died in April, A. D. 1875, at said Cornish. At the time of his death and for a long time before his death he was largely indebted to our son, Samuel Putnam. That my said husband left over and above his indebtedness but a small amount of property, and that was in land situate in said Cornish. My husband left no will, but prior to his death he entered into an arrangement with the said Samuel Putnam that I should have a home on the place where he died; meaning a seat at the table and a room in the house, and the sum of $40 in money to be paid to me yearly. That the said Samuel Putnam owns and occupies the homestead, and the above is all the support I have.

"That I am seventy-five years of age next March and in feeble health; that I need constant care and have no means, only as mentioned above, with which to make provision for my support; that with this scanty means I am not able to procure but few of the comforts of life.

"I further say that Col. Haldimand S. Putnam, deceased, was my second child; that my said son was a graduate at the military school at West Point, graduating in 1857; that when the war of the rebellion broke out my said son was in the military service of the United States as an engineer, on General McDowell's staff. From this position he was called to New Hampshire and appointed colonel of the Seventh New Hampshire Volunteers in December, 1861. He remained colonel of this regiment until July 18, 1863, when, in command of a brigade, he was killed in an assault upon Fort Wagner, South Carolina.

"Soon after the graduation of my said son he commenced rendering pecuniary aid to his father, mother, and two sisters. This he continued up to the time of his death. At different times he paid me money; at one time $40, at other times $20, on more than one occasion. That I then depended largely upon this assistance for the comforts of life, and without such assistance I and my family would have been in straitened circumstances. I further say, being thus deprived of the assistance of my said son, and being left by my husband in poor circumstances, I have struggled on, hoping to be able to complete my life without assistance from the General Government. I further say that the time has come when I am suffering for the necessaries of life, and I ask the General Government, on account of the services and the assistance of my said son, Col. Haldimand S. Putnam, to grant me such pension as may seem just under the circumstances.

"ADALINE M. PUTNAM.

"Personally appeared the above-named Adaline M. Putnam on this 27th day of October, 1885, and made oath that the above deposition by her subscribed is true.

"Before me.

"H. W. PARKER,
"Justice of the Peace."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to suggest an amendment to the amendment, that the sum mentioned in the bill be stricken out and that this applicant be put on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. HAYNES. I would say that that would be simply a useless amendment. I drew that report. The suggestion now made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] was made in the Committee on Invalid Pensions when the bill was being considered there. But the $30 to which the Senate recommendation was reduced is the sum this lady would be allowed under the provisions and limitations of the pension laws. It seems utterly useless to make what would simply be a verbal amendment.

Mr. PRICE. It appears to me it would do no harm for the gentleman to accept the amendment; and it then would not go abroad to the country that we were voting $30 pensions outside the provisions of the pension laws. At the same time I will say that having listened to the reading of the report I am not insensible to all this pitiful story.

Mr. HAYNES. The amendment is simply useless.

Mr. PRICE. Would it require the bill to go back to the Senate?

Mr. HAYNES. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. Then I do not insist on the point. My object is to treat all these applicants alike; but I withdraw the proposition to amend.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the committee.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN T. PENNINGTON.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 2940) granting a pension to John T. Pennington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John T. Pennington, late a private in Company B, Fiftieth Regiment East Missouri Militia Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN A. ORENDORFF.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FLORENCE MURRAY.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (S. 197) to increase the pension of Florence Murray.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, to increase the pension of Florence Murray, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Alexander Murray, from $30 to $50 a month, said increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PRICE. I shall have to object, Mr. Chairman, if it is proposed to increase the pension of this lady to $50 a month simply because she is the wife of a rear-admiral.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 197) to increase the pension of Florence Murray, submits the following report:

This committee adopts the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is appended hereto, and recommends the passage of the bill.

The claimant is the widow of Alexander Murray, late rear-admiral of the United States Navy, who died in the service November 10, 1884. The widow made application for a pension at the Department, and was placed on the pension-roll January 8, 1885, at the rate of $30 per month, Certificate No. 3245. An abstract of the naval record of this distinguished officer has been furnished the committee, and is as follows:

"Naval record of Rear-Admiral Alexander Murray, United States Navy, deceased. Compiled from official sources.

"Born in Pennsylvania; appointed from Pennsylvania August 22, 1835; attached to the West India squadron, 1836–'38; while in the West Indies sailed in the Warren, Grampus, Constellation, Saint Louis, and Vandalia; coast of Florida, Seminole war, 1839–'41; sailed in steamer Poinsett, cutter Van Buren, and served on the land in command of open boats; promoted to passed midshipman in 1841; coast of Florida, Seminole war, 1841–'42; Pacific squadron 1843–'45, in schooner Shark, frigate United States, and sloop of war Levant; Gulf of Mexico 1846, steamer Vixen, capture of Alvarado, Tobasco, Tuspan, Vera Cruz, and Tampico; slightly wounded at Alvarado; commissioned as lieutenant August 12, 1847. On razee Independence, Mediterranean squadron, 1849–'51; commanding United States steamer Fulton, West Indies, Vice-President King on board, 1852; receiving-ship at Norfolk 1853; commanding steamer Bibb, coast survey, 1857–'59; United States ship Cumberland, home squadron 1859; commanding United States steamer Pocahontas 1860–'61; detached at Norfolk, Va., and at the firing on Fort Sumter rejoined the United States ship Cumberland without orders; burning of navy-yard; commanding steamer Louisiana, North Atlantic blockading squadron, 1861–'62; repulse of rebel steamer Yorktown off Newport News, September, 1861; battle of Roanoke Island, February 8, 1862; battle of New Berne, N. C., 1862; commanded naval forces at the repulse of rebels under Hill from New Berne, N. C., February 14, 1862; commanded a naval and military expedition up the York River and Pamunkey River, which was entirely successful, destroying twenty-seven vessels, two large steamers among the number, approaching to within 11 miles of Richmond, in the month of May, 1862. This expedition was afloat, and the enemy in sight nearly all the time; commissioned as commander July 16, 1862; special duty in sounds of North Carolina, 1863; navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., 1864–'65; commanding special squadron to Russia, 1866–'67; commissioned as captain July 25, 1866; navy-yard, Philadelphia, 1868–'70; commissioned as commodore June 19, 1871; member Light-House Board 1873–'76; commissioned as rear-admiral April 26, 1876; commanding Pacific squadon, 1876–'78.

"It is believed that the committee have uniformly recommended favorably the passage of bills providing for the increase asked in this case for the widows of rear-admirals, and they therefore report back this bill and recommend that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the understanding that a separate vote should be taken upon its passage.

LURENA WAGES.

Mr. TAULBEE, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 6668) granting a pension to Lurena Wages.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lurena Wages, widow of Jackson Wages, late private in Company E, Seventh Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE W. CRAMBLETT.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, called up the bill (H. R. 6000) granting a pension to George W. Cramblett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Cramblett, dependent father of John C. Cramblett, late of Company G, Ninety-seventh Ohio Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CONGER Mr. Chairman, my conviction as to the just demand for more liberal pension legislation and the consequent duty of this Congress in that direction is positive and unwavering. Ours is a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people." The citizen's first duty is to the Republic—in time of peace to promote its growth and prosperity, and in time of war to protect, defend, and save it from its enemies. In peace and war the Government's most sacred duty is to study the needs and to provide for the comfort and well-being of the citizen. The obligation is mutual, the Government to the people and the people to the Government. Neither can avoid the responsibility or shirk the duty without each being mutually harmed, endangered, or disgraced.

In 1861, when the first guns of treason were trained on Fort Sumter, and traitorous hands tore down the old flag from above her walls, the loyal people, remembering their highest obligation of citizenship, with marvelous alacrity rushed to her defense, and the wail of distress sent forth by the great Abraham Lincoln was heard across the continent, and from Maine, Iowa, California, and all the States between came trooping sad, thoughtful, brave, determined men. Seventy-five thousand, three hundred thousand, six hundred thousand, a million and more, with sword and gun, rallied around the flag, followed it through four years of bloody war, fought for it on over two thousand battlefields, until over three hundred thousand of the flower of the youth and manhood of this country were sacrificed, and returned it at last with "not a star bedimmed or stripe erased," to float again over a union of States, recemented with loyal blood, rebaptized with liberty's light, "forever one, forever free."

This is the duty of faithful citizenship, promptly, grandly, heroically performed. The corresponding obligation due from the Government thus protected and saved is to summon all the material resources at its command to compensate and reward its saviours.

Full compensation, adequate reward, can never be made. The value of individual life, sight, or limb can not be measured by aught that Government can command or contribute. The citizen's chief consolation must be in the supreme consciousness of having performed immeasurable service to humanity and freedom, and a trust in God and the future for reward. But the Government can make partial recompense by reasonably pensioning the disabled and crippled survivors among her defenders, and the widows and orphans of those who laid down their lives.

The alacrity with which our citizens responded to their country's call was the marvel of all the world; nothing like it had history recorded. The farmer left his plow afield, the smith his forge ablaze, the machinist his lathe still turning, the merchant his wares unshelved, the judge his court in term, the lawyer his brief unfiled, the doctor his patient uncured, the parson his sermon unpreached, the student his book half read; the father tore himself from wife and child, to mother and sister the son gave parting kiss, and all rushed nobly to the rescue. This was because they loved freedom and its flag, had faith in the future of the Republic, and knew that those who should administer their Government would deal justly with them or their dear ones who might survive them.

The Government has acknowledged this obligation and has dealt out pensions with seeming liberality—it has been said with more generosity than the soldiers of any government in the world have received. Ah, but no such soldiers ever went to battle. The bravest men of their race met in deadly encounter. There was equal valor upon either side. Their engagements were the most desperate in all the annals of the world's wars. When such foes met in shock of battle the thunder of the contest echoed around the world. A comparison of the losses in some of the most sanguinary battles of the Old World will but demonstrate the bravery and heroism required in many of our own.

At Waterloo the loss was only 12 per cent. of those engaged, but at Shiloh the loss was more than 30 per cent.; at Wagram, 5 per cent.; at Wurzburg, 3½ per cent.; at Zurich, 8 per cent.; at Racour, 2½ per cent.;

at Ramilies, 6 per cent.; at Malplaquet, 10 per cent.; at Lagriz, 6½ per cent.; at Contras, 10 per cent.; at Lodi, 1½ per cent.; at Valmy, 3 per cent.; at Marengo, 15 per cent.; at Austerlitz, 13 per cent.; at Magenta, 8 per cent.; at Solferino, 9 per cent.; at Konigrath, 6 per cent.; at Werth, 11 per cent.; at Spechram, 10 per cent.; at Mars le Tour, 13 per cent.; at Gravelotte, 12 per cent.; at Sedan, 15 per cent.; while at Perryville, Murfreesborough, Gettysburg, Mission Ridge, Chickamauga, the Wilderness, and Spottsylvania the loss often exceeded 40 per cent. of those engaged, and the average was over 30 per cent.

No such soldiery ever marched to battle, and hence no such heroes ever returned with victorious laurels to lay at the feet of their Government and ask a pension so well and so thoroughly earned. The soldiers of the late war have richly merited all the pensions that are or can be paid them. The pension is not a gratuity, as has been so often said on the other side of this House. The crippled veteran has paid right royally for it, with the blood poured out at Manassas, with the good right arm left at Nashville, with the shattered leg cut off at Chickamauga, with eyes shot out at Stone River and the life-long darkness that remains, with the broken health, shattered constitution, and festering wounds that have made him a constant sufferer and shortened his life by years. The widows and orphans have paid ten thousand times its value in the lives of husband and father who went down in the blood and carnage of dreadful war, and who now sleep in unknown graves in shady forest or on Southern plain, or quietly rest under the hallowed mounds in those charming cities of the dead—our national cemeteries.

Theorists and sentimentalists may prate of the instinctive patriotism of the citizen that should impel him to offer himself a willing sacrifice upon his country's altar. Poets may sing that "it is sweet to die for one's country." But the practical patriot wants to understand that his country will care for him if he is maimed and disabled or for his wife and children if he yields up his life in patriotic service. The theory of our law is not that a pension is a reward of merit, a prize for gallant achievement. But that in consideration of services rendered, and disabilities incurred therein, the Government is bound, so far as possible, to make compensation for such disability. The disability being established, the rate is fixed by the degree the soldier is incapacitated for manual labor or to fight the battles of life for bread; the amount is computed by the month, and hence should begin with the date of discharge or disability.

If a soldier lost a leg upon the battlefield of Shiloh, and the Government concludes that it will pay $30 per month for the loss of a leg, he should be paid for every month from the date of his discharge, and not from some later period, years afterwards. So for every other disability, when the date of incurrence is clearly proven.

The Government has recognized and acted upon this principle by the passage of the arrears acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879.

This was a most righteous enactment, but the proviso which limited its application to cases filed before July 1, 1880, was manifestly unfair, inequitable, and unjust. There is no good reason why A, who filed his application June 30, 1880, should be entitled to have his pension dated back to 1864, while B, who filed his July 1, only twenty-four hours later, should only receive pension from date of filing, although they were comrades in arms, fought in the same organizations, and both disabled at same time and place and in same way. There can be no just reason why C, who has worn with modest pride his scars received in battle and suffered in silence during all these years the pains of disease incurred while nobly fighting for the old flag, happy and content with the proud consciousness of patriotic duty well performed—there is, I say, no just reason why, when reverse of fortune and the pains and sufferings that wait upon increasing age prompt him to exhibit his wounds and scars and ask for aid, he should be debarred the same generous recognition as D, who, with no severer disabilities, but with less courage and pride, held out his hand for aid years before.

A government can not be just and at the same time make unfair and invidious discrimination between her citizens. All should be accorded equal privileges and equal consideration. The present bill proposes to do tardy justice to thousands of deserving men by raising the limitation in the arrears act and extending it to January 1, 1888. In my judgment, the repeal ought to be unconditional, because the same objections will lie and the same criticisms be pertinent at its termination in 1888 as now, and the Government could thus more easily meet the demands upon the Treasury, because there would then be no unnecessary haste in filing applications. But this date, January 1, 1888, was fixed by the committee as a compromise, and will probably give relief to the great majority of those who deserve it.

The chief objection to this proposed pension legislation is that it will cost too much, that it will make inordinate drafts upon the Treasury, even to the verge of national bankruptcy. I concede the fact of great cost, of enormous expenditure, but as to possible or even probable bankruptcy, I enter a most emphatic general denial.

The unholy rebellion was suppressed and the Union preserved at an appalling expenditure of human life and human sacrifice. But the redemption of the Republic was worth all it cost, and the patriotic, liberty and Union loving citizens made generous and willing contributions of life and limb to that end. Their maimed and crippled condition now demands like liberal and generous consideration on the part of the Republic, and it should be willingly and cheerfully granted regardless of cost, for, thank God, the resultant possibilities of their victories are almost limitless. The distinguished Commissioner of Pensions estimates that the total possible cost to the Government of the unconditional repeal of the limitation will not exceed $222,000,000, and that he can not make expenditures in any one year to exceed $50,000,000. Yet he heartily recommends the repeal.

The estimate of his predecessor, whose longer service in the office and greater familiarity therewith should make his testimony of equal if not greater value, places the amount at a much smaller figure, and from a careful calculation made from the tables furnished by the Commissioner, and a fair conjecture as to the number of applications yet to be made, it is generally conceded that the amount will not exceed $150,000,000; and this amount must necessarily be scattered out through a series of years. So that at no time would the annual expenditure, including the present roll, probably reach beyond $100,000,000, and the amount would rapidly and surely decrease as the years go by. The Commissioner in his estimate has taken $100 as the average yearly value of a pension, which, I think, is considerably in excess of the true value. A patient computation from the table below, taken from the Commissioner's last report, will show that the average value of a pension in 1885 was only $87.75.

The majority of these pensions have been gradually increasing, many starting twenty years ago with a nominal amount of only $2 per month, and have now reached the highest limit. If the average now is only $87.75, it is fair to presume that the average for the past twenty years would be very much less, probably not over $60. Of course, to this must be added the expense of examining and adjusting each claim, which being done, we can still reduce the estimate of the Commissioner 40 per cent.

Can it be possible that a great Government that has increased in wealth $1,000,000,000 per year for the past twenty years, and that is collecting annually from customs and revenue over $500,000,000, with no individual feeling the burden, would thus plead inability to pay its just and sacred obligations? No, sir; these obligations ought to be paid and can be, without any additional burdens upon the people. Why, Mr. Chairman, 10 per cent. of the dairy product of this country would pay the whole amount in four years, and I am sure if the Government would make this plea of poverty to them, the loyal women of the land would gladly contribute the amount from the work of their own hands for so noble a purpose. As their great hearts opened during the war for these men, so they are still swelling with patriotic gratitude and generosity for the same heroes. The value of the eggs produced in this country would meet and liquidate this demand in less than four years. The demand is small in comparison with our great wealth and immense productions.

But could it at once be paid out it would be equivalent to so much added to our circulation, for the pensioners are mostly poor, and the amounts received would at once be used to pay debts to butcher, baker, banker, merchant, and manufacturer, the wheels of business would be lubricated, and a general business improvement result, and so great good come to the whole people for the discharge of this just obligation to the few.

If our Democratic friends upon the other side of this House have faith in the utterances of their great leaders they should now vote that these men who made an overflowing Treasury possible should be at once paid this pittance out of the "unlimited and useless surplus in the vaults." This would be a far better and more meritorious method of scattering the surplus than by the cyclone method proposed by the late Vice-President Hendricks and reiterated by the majority of his Democratic followers throughout the length and breadth of the land.

During the campaign of 1884 the "tremendous surplus," the bursting vaults, was the burden of the song with which your Democratic orators tickled the ears of the dear people all over the land, and the great panacea which you offered for all the ills that government and people are heir to was the promise that when the "rascals" should be turned out you would balance the books, place large amounts to the credit of the people, unlock the vaults and scatter with lavish hand the surplus which the Republican party, by its wise, economic, and patriotic administration had wisely husbanded, to meet the sacred obligations of the Republic to its creditors and saviors. The people believed you, and testified their faith in your promises by placing you in possession of the Department at the other end of the avenue, and permitting you to retain the majority on this floor. You have had the "books" for a whole year, but you have placed the credits on the other side. For twelve months the "keys" have been dangling at your belts, yet the vaults are still locked and the surplus swelling. We offer you now a just, an honorable, a patriotic method by which you may keep your pledge; and I summon you, gentlemen, to its fulfillment, or else ask you to acknowledge that you were insincere or grossly ignorant. The people of this great nation demand that you say which, and you can not send the answer through whispering telephones, but in these pan-electric times you must speak out on this question so all the land can hear.

I was sincerely gratified the other day by the very eloquent speech of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. He gave the true theory of our pension system when he said:

> I believe most cordially in the fundamental principle upon which all pension systems are founded. I believe it is wise to adopt as a settled policy of a republican government that those of her sons who risk their lives and health in her military service shall be rewarded therefor.
> It is right when a man who is the hope of a family and its capital deliberately risks that capital in the service of his country, that, so far as it is impaired in the service, it should be made up by the government to whom the service is given, that if a man fall his family shall be put as if he had not fallen; if his strength by disability be impaired, if it were necessary for their support, the impairment shall be made up by the government. And it is wise to let it be understood that those who offer their lives in defense of their country may be assured that if they fall some provision will be made for their families, or if they become disabled a suitable provision in proportion to the disability shall be made for them.

Noble words, fitly spoken. But, after acknowledging this obligation on the part of the Government, of which to-day he is an honored representative, he says the amount necessary to meet these just obligations, these implied yet sacred promises, is so startling that he calls a halt in what he designates this "wild chase for pensions;" and he says, "I, for one, am not willing to go any further on this road; for one, here I halt."

Let me name for the gentleman a really startling amount.

We have paid off since 1862 nearly $1,000,000,000 of bonds and more than $2,000,000,000 of interest on bonds. These are startling figures indeed, absolutely bewildering. Why not call a halt here? Make no more calculations of interest and pay no more. Oh, you say our bonds and coupons are out; we can not repudiate these; that would be a national crime. Ah, gentlemen, the bond of the Republic is out for these other debts due to these pensioners; it is written with their blood, sealed with their life, and sanctified with orphans' and with widows' tears.

The one obligation is just as sacred as the other, and to repudiate either would be a public disgrace, a national crime, no matter how startling the amounts. Yet who of you that are so startled at the vast amount of our pension-roll as to cry halt in this direction ever raise your voice to suggest a halt in the other? Not one. Why? I will tell you why. Because the bond written in ink is held by capital and wealth, and the one written in blood is held by labor and poverty. I desire to insert here a table showing the amount of money paid by the Government for pensions and for interest on the public debt.

Year.	Pensions.	Interest.
1862	$852,170 47	$13,190,344 84
1863	1,078,513 36	24,729,700 62
1864	4,985,473 90	53,685,421 69
1865	16,347,621 34	77,395,090 30
1866	15,605,549 88	133,067,624 91
1867	20,936,551 71	143,781,591 91
1868	23,782,386 78	140,424,045 71
1869	28,476,621 78	130,694,242 80
1870	28,340,202 17	129,235,498 00
1871	34,443,894 88	125,576,565 93
1872	28,553,402 76	117,357,839 72
1873	29,359,426 86	104,750,688 44
1874	29,038,414 66	107,119,815 21
1875	29,456,216 22	103,093,544 57
1876	28,257,396 69	100,243,271 23
1877	27,963,752 27	97,124,511 58
1878	27,137,019 08	102,500,874 65
1879	35,121,482 39	105,327,949 00
1880	56,777,174 44	95,757,575 11
1881	50,059,279 62	82,508,741 18
1882	61,345,193 95	71,077,206 79
1883	66,012,573 64	51,436,709 50
1884	55,429,228 06	47,926,432 50
1885	65,733,094 27	47,014,133 00
Total	765,092,640 18	2,205,019,419 19

From this it may be seen that the average yearly payment of interest to the bondholder is $91,800,000; average yearly pension-roll, $31,800,000; excess paid yearly to bondholders, $60,000,000. There has also been paid of the principal of the public debt $899,054,445; add amount interest paid, $2,205,019,419, and we have total paid bondholders, $3,104,073,864; total paid pensioners, $765,092,640; excess paid bondholders over pensioners, $2,338,981,224.

These amounts are enormous, almost incomprehensible, yet they should not be startling to the man who fairly contemplates the priceless heritage gained by these expenditures, namely, a Union preserved, a Government increased in wealth more than threefold, and with a world-wide credit appreciated to a degree above and beyond all other governments in the world. The distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] says the men from the South can not be blamed for opposing these pensions when they pay one-third of all the revenue tax and do not get one cent of these pensions. The annual report of Commissioner Black, whose ability, character, and conduct gentlemen have so earnestly defended, shows that there is paid in pensions to the Southern States yearly over $5,000,000, which of itself is almost a startling amount.

Let me also remind gentlemen that if they will compile the numerous war claims that have been paid to citizens of the South, add the amount loaned or given to the New Orleans Exposition and the amount expended in improving the Lower Mississippi and on all the rivers and unimportant creeks in the Southern States, and the lion's share of the amount proposed in the Blair educational bill, it will aggregate a sum that would startle the gentleman from Kentucky almost as vigorously as does this proposed pension expenditure. No, gentlemen of the South, this is no "jug-handled" question; you are receiving a reasonably fair share of our revenue and customs; and may God speed the day when, by reason of the advancement of your industries and the development of the latent resources that nature has planted among you, you shall receive much more.

Mr. Chairman, I am not only in favor of the repeal of this limitation, unconditionally, but I am also in favor of placing every soldier who is now disabled upon the pension-roll, with pension rated according to his disability, he simply being required to prove his service and that his disability is not the result of his own vicious habits or gross carelessness. This is a measure of especial merit and should be passed at once, to the end that thousands of brave veterans who gave the vigor and strength of their young lives to the cause of their country, and by their valor and heroism saved the young Republic from the dissolution that threatened it, may be lifted from the suffering depths into which disease and broken health have driven them; that they may be saved from the almshouses toward which they are now tottering, and thus learn by practical experience that even some republics can be grateful. How much will this measure cost? I do not know. There are no reliable data from which to make a calculation. But I do know that it is right, and that government which shall long withhold such merited relief is unworthy the love, devotion, and defense of such loyal defenders.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to see this question of pensions stripped of all gush and sentiment, eliminated from all political considerations, and discussed upon the abstract issue of its own righteousness and justice.

If we do this we can all stand upon one platform, to wit, the implied promise, the unquestioned obligation of the Government to its defenders, clearly and tersely expressed by the eloquent gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

We upon this floor, so far as this matter goes, represent and are a component part of the Government, and we will be recreant to the great trust confided to us if we refuse by our votes, on the first opportunity, to perform the full measure of this obligation.

I know it will take large sums of money. But I desire to say right here, and with no purpose to stir up the smoldering ashes of the late war, that the necessity for this great expenditure grew out of the attempt of a part of the citizens of this Republic to destroy it. And one of the chief lessons taught by the war, and the logic of which is irresistible, and the effect of which should be most salutary and lasting, is, that such attempts are and must ever be tremendously expensive, and that the expense must of necessity fall heaviest upon those making the attempt, and they can not and ought not escape their just responsibility. No man who studies the history of this country with an eye single to its glory and prosperity can regret the final outcome of our great struggle, or fail to appreciate the magnitude and the grandeur of the victory won by the soldiers of the Union Army. Their fight was made for the whole Union, for every league of it from Maine to Texas, from Puget Sound to Key West, and for every human being within its borders.

Why not, gentlemen, then accept your share of the triumph and bear without a murmur your share of the burdens, heavy though they be? It was my fortune in September, 1881, at Chattanooga, Tenn., to assist in the ceremony of raising a national flag by an equal number of ex-Union and ex-confederate soldiers. About six hundred of each had marched to the top and were encircling the summit of Cameron Hill, when at a given signal the old flag was run up by the hands of both parties, while the assembled bands played the Star Spangled Banner, and as it neared the top of the pole each vied with the other in their vociferous shouts for the red, white, and blue. There, under the towering presence of Lookout Mountain and in sight of Mission Ridge, with all their clustering memories, with the old flag waving proudly above them, these men bowed their heads and solemnly vowed henceforth and forever to protect and defend it. I believed then that the most of those men meant what they said; and, gentlemen, the best protection to that flag and the Government it represents, the most praiseworthy defense, is to see to it that all just and sacred obligations be promptly and fully discharged.

It has been, my brethren, upon such pledges as this at Chattanooga that you have come again to the "house of your fathers," and I trust that for the good of our common country, for its advancement and its perpetuity, you may be led to see your duty in far different light from that expressed by your recent vote upon the widows' pension bill. You never have found and you never will find this side of the House voting against measures which they acknowledge to be just and right simply because the appropriations growing out of them will be expended among other than Republican constituencies. I, for one, shall, without fear of private taunt or public criticism, always vote to discharge an honest obligation of this Government, even if the sole benefit accrues to Virginia or South Carolina; and I shall vote for every reasonable and righteous recognition of the services of the men who were the nation's bulwark and defense in the hour of her greatest peril, and of the widows and orphans who bring their annual offering of love and flowers to the graves of martyred husbands and fathers; and I shall also, if permitted, vote for such ways and means as will enable us to meet the full measure of these obligations.

Men of the North, I beseech you by the promise you made to the two million boys of 1861–'65, by the memory of the half million dead whose spirits are now hovering in faithful vigils over the destinies of this Republic, by their widows' tears and orphans' cries, by the empty sleeves, the sightless eyes, the crippled and wounded forms all over this land; and, men of the South, I entreat you by the deliverance which they wrought for you, by the grand possibilities opened up for you in the new civilization guaranteed by their sacrifices and their success—I beseech you all, from East, from West, from North, from South, by the glory of your common country, preserved by their valor, by the events which cause the old flag to float to-day over this marble Capitol an honest emblem of liberty and union—I implore you every one to deal fairly and generously with the men who wrought for you this glory, who saved for you this flag.

White, deceased, late a second-class fireman in the United States Navy (pension claim numbered 3618), on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, to commence from the date of the death of her said husband.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "navy," in the sixteenth line, and insert in lieu thereof the words, "on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NATHAN MAGOON.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask to call up House bill No. 6504, granting a pension to Nathan Magoon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nathan Magoon, late a private in Company H, Seventh Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM BLANCHARD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask consent to call up the bill of the Senate No. 1363, granting a pension to William Blanchard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Blanchard, late a corporal of Company D, Sixth Vermont Infantry.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM J. HUDSON.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4850) for the relief of William J. Hudson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William J. Hudson, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

STEVENS W. MERRILL.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4461) granting a pension to Stevens W. Merrill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Stevens W. Merrill, late of the Thirty-sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteers.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

Strike out all after the words "Stevens W. Merrill," in the sixth line, and insert the words "late lieutenant and quartermaster of the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Iowa Volunteers."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GREENVILLE R. HALE.

Mr. HALSELL. I ask to call up the bill (H. R. 6039) for the relief of Greenville R. Hale.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Greenville R. Hale, late a private in Company G, Sixty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

ELIZABETH M'KAY.

Mr. NEECE. Mr. Chairman, I call up House bill No. 4782, granting a pension to Elizabeth McKay.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth McKay, widow of Rowley S. McKay, late a pilot in the United States naval fleet, at the rate of $30 per month, to date from the death of her said husband.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out all of said bill after the enacting clause, and insert the following: "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Elizabeth McKay, widow of Rawley S. McKay, deceased, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES SEBRING.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill No. 3135, granting a pension to Charles Sebring.

A bill (H. R. 6519) granting a pension to John D. Krebbiel; the title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to John D. Krehbiel."

Bills of the Senate of the following titles were reported with amendments, the amendments were agreed to, and the bills as amended were ordered to a third reading; and were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 814) granting a pension to Mrs. Adaline M. Putnam; and A bill (S. 683) granting a pension to Henry O. Hill.

FLORENCE MURRAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There remains the bill S. 1363, which is the bill that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] requested should be reported separately.

Mr. PRICE. I should have said the bill (S. 197) to increase the pension of Florence Murray.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that this bill is included among those which have been passed. The gentleman, however, can move to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. No advantage will be taken of the gentleman. We can go back and reconsider the action which has been taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the action of the House in passing the bill S. 197 will be reconsidered and the bill will be before the House for consideration.

There was no objection.

The bill (S. 197) to increase the pension of Florence Murray was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, to increase the pension of Florence Murray, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Alexander Murray, from $30 to $50 per month, such increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. PRICE. I have no long speech to make on this subject. But to be consistent with my past record, and my conceptions of what is right, I must insist that this bill shall not pass to increase the pension of any woman, be she the widow of an officer or of a private, in violation of the general rule applicable to other widows of soldiers and sailors.

Now, I need not talk longer on this bill. The only thing that can be urged in favor of it is the precedent of the past; and if we are not able as a House to make some better precedents than those that have heretofore led us into error, we may as well adjourn and go home. I hope this House will not increase this pension. Gentlemen capture the fancy and secure the action of the House night after night and day after day by a long and eloquent recital of the boldness, the gallantry, the bravery, the patriotism of the soldier or the officer in every case where an increase of pension is asked. Why, sir, you might make up a general history of that kind, and apply it to any man who ever bore the arms or sailed under the flag of the Union and was never convicted of treason.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the report in this case except to direct the attention of the House to the clause of the report which states:

It is believed that the committee have uniformly recommended favorably the passage of bills providing for the increase asked in this case for the widows of rear-admirals.

Now, whether that be true or not in all cases I am not prepared to say, but to my own certain knowledge there have been quite a number of widows of rear-admirals provided for in the manner and at the rate proposed in this bill, and I do not wish the House to discriminate against this lady. I desire simply that she shall have what the precedents show has been given to others.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM BLANCHARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the House that one bill was left over, under the impression that it was the bill upon which a separate vote was desired. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (S. 1363) granting a pension to William Blanchard.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes by which the bills were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The House then, on motion of Mr. MATSON (at 8 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDWELL: Petition of Southern Methodist Publishing House and the Cumberland Presbyterian Publishing House, Nashville, Tenn., for reduction of postage on pamphlets issued by churches and benevolent societies containing reports of their official transactions—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. LOVERING: Resolution of Assembly No. 4257, Knights of Labor, of Chelsea, Mass., in relation to the House bill creating a Department of Agriculture and Labor—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also resolution of Local Assembly No. 4257, Knights of Labor, of Chelsea, Mass, protesting against the increase of rates of postage on fourth-class mail matter—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. NEAL: Petition of H. T. Cox, of Blount County, Tennessee, asking pay for property taken and used by the United States Army during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. NORWOOD: Petition of the Savannah (Ga.) bar for an increase of salaries of United States judges—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PERKINS: Memorial of Local Assembly No. 4729, Knights of Labor, of Cherokee, Kans., asking for liberal appropriations for internal improvements, and particularly for the Hennepin Canal—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. PLUMB: Petition of Elenor Washburn, president of the Chicago Live Stock Association, and 120 firms and individuals, commission stock dealers of Chicago, Ill., protesting against the passage of Senate bill No. 1715, which regulates the unloading and feeding of stock in transit—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR: Petition of C. M. Dowling, heir of Michael Dowling, of Shelby County, Tennessee, asking that his war claim be referred to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER: Petition of Daniel Thompson, of Tuscumbia, Ala.; of T. J. Hangiss and of William C. Thomas, of Jackson County, Alabama, asking that their war claims be referred to the Court of Claims—to the same committee.

By Mr. WISE: Two petitions of Knights of Labor of Viriginia in reference to the free-ship bill—to the Select Committee on American Shipbuilding and Ship-owning Interests.

Also, two petitions of Knights of Labor in favor of the Hennepin Canal—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The following petitions, praying Congress for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia, in the Territories, in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. CUTCHEON: Of citizens of Mecosta, Oceana, Manistee, and Lake Counties, Michigan.

By Mr. GROUT: Of citizens of Windham County, Vermont.

By Mr. HITT: Of citizens of Ogle, Winnebago, and Jo Daviess Counties, Illinois.

By Mr. LEHLBACH: Of citizens of Essex County, New Jersey.

By Mr. MARKHAM: Of citizens of the sixth district of California.

By Mr. PIRCE: Of citizens of Providence and Kent Counties, Rhode Island.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 3, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates from the Interior Department of an appropriation to pay additional pensions allowed under the act of March 19, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN-DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with accompanying papers, a list of Indian-depredation claims, with a statement of the action of the Department thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, for six days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. VAN SCHAICK, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DUNN, indefinitely, on account of sudden illness.

To Mr. SPOONER, until April 10, on account of important business.

To Mr. PIRCE, for two weeks, on account of important business.

HURD VS. ROMEIS.

Mr. ROBERTSON, on behalf of the minority of the Committee on Elections, presented their views on the contested-election case of Hurd against Romeis; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN FISHERMEN.

Mr. REED, of Maine, presented the following memorial; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

At a meeting of the Portland Fishing Exchange, held at their rooms March 30, the following resolution was unanimously adopted, and it was ordered that a copy of the same be sent to Hon. THOMAS B. REED, our Representative to Congress:

"Whereas information has been received through the Assistant Secretary of State that American vessels have no right to enter Canadian bays or harbors only for shelter, damage, and purchasing wood and water: Therefore,

"We memorialize Congress to take some immediate action that shall deprive provincial fishermen of the same privileges of entering American bays and harbors that are denied by the Dominion Government to American fishermen; and

"Whereas there are several provincial vessels in our port purchasing bait for the purpose of carrying on their cod-fisheries: Therefore,

"We ask that the same restrictions be placed upon their vessels which enter American ports for bait that the Canadian Government has imposed upon American vessels; and

"Whereas the Canadian Government has already fitted out cruisers ostensibly to keep American vessels outside the 3-mile limit, so called: Therefore,

"We pray that our Government send a sufficient number of armed vessels to look after and protect the rights of American vessels."

O. B. WHITTEN, Secretary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I call up the special order for the day, which is the consideration of the adverse report on the bill (H. R. 5690) for the free coinage of silver, and for other purposes.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration in regard to that bill, and I desire to state that it is not done for the purpose of antagonizing the bill, but in order——

Mr. ROGERS. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I desire to make a statement, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable, and the regular order is demanded.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Just one word——

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My point is that, by the special order of February 23, made by unanimous consent of the House on motion of Mr. MORRISON, Saturday was set apart for debate only, no other business to be transacted. The order of March 16, as I understand, so far modified the order of February 23 as to limit the discussion on certain Saturdays named to the silver question. Now, I do not understand that half a dozen gentlemen can come here on Saturday to make speeches, and then, after they come here, take up by a vote some other business and proceed to pass bills. I understand that the order to which I have referred remains in full force, and that under that order to-day can not be devoted to anything but the discussion of the silver question.

The SPEAKER. The first order to which the gentleman from Ohio has referred sat apart or dedicated each Saturday during the remainder of the session, unless otherwise ordered, to general debate in Committee of the Whole; and of course so long as the order remained in force no other business could be transacted on those days. But afterward the House made another order, by which the silver bill, as it is called, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] has now called up, was made a special order for three Saturdays named; but this order did not set apart or dedicate those days exclusively to the consideration of this bill, as the gentleman from Ohio will see if he refers to the language of the order.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. As I understood, the prior order continued in force with simply this limitation.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to make a statement in order that we may reach some understanding.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the question of consideration is not debatable.

Mr. BLAND. I ask consent to make a very brief statement. I understand that my colleague from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], on behalf of the Committee on Labor, asks only an hour, and agrees if the House will give him that time we shall after that resume the consideration of the special order. With that understanding I would make no objection.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Such an agreement would be of no use; for if the enemies of the labor-arbitration bill find that it can be thrown over by talking for an hour, there is language enough on the other side to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. I understood an hour was all that my colleague asked for the consideration of that bill to-day.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now proceed to the consideration of the special order?

Mr. BURROWS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURROWS. If the House should decide not to proceed with the special order—that is, the silver bill—would we not then be remanded to the first order dedicating Saturday to debate only?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is the ground I have taken.

The SPEAKER. That is a somewhat difficult question——

Mr. REED, of Maine. I hope that the order of the House adopted on motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], giving the labor-arbitration bill the right of way, may be read. If the Clerk will turn to that order and read it we shall know where we stand. According to my recollection of its terms, the order gave the labor-arbitration bill the right of way to such an extent as to give it precedence now; but I may be mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House was that the Committee on Labor should have leave to report at any time such measure in regard to arbitration as that committee might agree upon, and that it should be considered—in other words, that the committee should have leave to report for consideration. It has always been held, however, even without the language "report for consideration," that when a committee is allowed to report at any time it has the right to demand consideration of the measure reported.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The order extends further than to the mere right of reporting.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If the House should decide not to consider the silver bill, then I understand the consideration of the bill of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] has charge may be demanded.

The SPEAKER. That raises the question which was just propounded to the Chair by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. The Chair was about to say that it is a somewhat difficult question; but the judgment of the Chair is that when the House made the silver bill, so called, a special order for three successive Saturdays it was the intention to do away with the former order so far as it applied to those three Saturdays. Therefore, the Chair thinks, if the House should now refuse to proceed with the consideration of the bill reported adversely by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, it will be in order for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the labor bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That is right.

Mr. BLAND. I am willing that the bill of the Committee on Labor shall be considered for an hour. But I think the laboring men would rather have plenty of money; that would end the strike.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Chair please state the precise question we are to vote upon?

The SPEAKER. The special order for to-day is the bill in relation to free coinage of silver. The question now is whether the House will proceed to consider that bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 68, noes 72.

Mr. LANHAM. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 52 members voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to make a proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to make a proposition to his colleague from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL]. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAND. As I understood, my colleague was willing to agree (and I consented to the arrangement) that an hour be given to the consideration of his bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I object to that limitation.

Mr. BLAND. If that is my colleague's proposition, I hope the House will accede to it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I can state on behalf of the Committee on Labor that they will not occupy a minute of time in debate, but merely ask votes on the different propositions; and if my colleague [Mr. BLAND] can control the enemies of the bill we can get through in fifteen minutes.

Mr. BLAND. The silver bill is far more important to the labor interests than the other.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] objects to the arrangement proposed.

Mr. BLAND. Then we insist on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the special order, which is the bill reported adversely from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures?

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 87, noes 128, not voting 108; as follows:

So the motion was disagreed to.

During the roll-call, on motion of Mr. MCMILLIN, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

For this day:

Mr. CULBERSON with Mr. BROWN, of Ohio.

Mr. MILLS with Mr. ROCKWELL.

Mr. COLE with BUNNELL.

Mr. MAHONEY with Mr. ROWELL.

Mr. HEARD with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. BLISS with Mr. VAN SCHAICK.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. STEPHENSON. Mr. MULLER, if present, would vote in favor of the labor-arbitration bill.

Mr. MCCREARY with Mr. MILLARD.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. EVANS.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. MCKENNA.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. LINDSLEY.

Mr. COBB with Mr. CASWELL.

Mr. DOWDNEY with Mr. DUNHAM.

Mr. MERRIMAN with Mr. SPOONER.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. RICE.

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. BINGHAM, on the labor-arbitration bill. Mr. BLOUNT would vote against, Mr. BINGHAM for the bill.

Mr. HENLEY with Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina, on the labor-arbitration bill. If present, Mr. HENLEY would vote for the bill, Mr. GREEN against it.

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL, on the labor-arbitration bill. If present, Mr. CAMPBELL would vote for the bill, Mr. BALLENTINE against it.

On this vote:

Mr. WISE with Mr. RANNEY.

Until further notice:

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, with Mr. PIRCE.

Mr. BOYLE with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. LEHLBACH.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. STRUBLE.

Mr. GOFF with Mr. SAYERS.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. MILLIKEN.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. LOUTTIT.

Mr. OUTHWAITE with Mr. WEST.

Mr. CABELL with Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BEACH, who was paired, if present, would vote for the labor-arbitration bill.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

LABOR-ARBITRATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to proceed to the consideration of the special order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the labor-arbitration bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the remaining section of the bill and amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I move an hour instead of ten minutes. That is little enough, I think.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the previous question and declines to withdraw it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I was recognized informally.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Missouri had the right to demand the previous question on his motion.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, to close debate in ten minutes was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the labor-arbitration bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of the controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés.

The CHAIRMAN. The fifth section of the bill was read at the last sitting of the committee. By order of the House all debate upon this section and proposed amendments thereto is limited to ten minutes. The Chair will recognize gentlemen for the presentation of amendments, which will be read at this time, to be taken up for consideration in their regular order after the ten minutes' debate shall have been had. The gentleman from Missouri has an amendment pending.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, Witness fees shall not be allowed and paid by the United States in any case for more than three witnesses on each side, whose testimony shall be directed to any one point; and all fees shall be certified by the commission to the district judge of the United States of the district in which the commission is held, who shall tax and certify the same as fees in cases before said court.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, upon that amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to be heard upon my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. At the proper time the Chair will recognize the gentleman. The Chair will first recognize gentlemen who desire to submit amendments.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I submitted an amendment last evening which has not yet been read.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment will be read.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas by making it ten witnesses in each case.

The CHAIRMAN. At the proper time that amendment will be in order.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, or rather an inquiry to understand the meaning of the Chair. Does the Chair mean that nobody can propose amendments to this bill unless they do it now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not hold that amendments may not be offered hereafter; but has suggested, for the sake of having the amendments before the committee before the discussion is had which is permitted by the order of the House, that all gentlemen desiring to submit amendments send them up to be read for information.

Mr. HAMMOND. But suppose some gentlemen having amendments to offer should differ with the Chair as to the proper time for submitting them or as to the propriety of discussing the amendments as submitted? The gentleman from Arkansas has stated his desire to discuss his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Arkansas to offer an amendment, although the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] had one which was submitted on yesterday evening which has not yet been read. The Chair will recognize the gentleman if he desires to offer other amendments.

Mr. ROGERS. But whether I desire to offer other amendments or not depends upon whether this is adopted.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I wish to have my amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there can not be a vote taken upon any of the amendments until the discussion for ten minutes has been had.

Mr. ROGERS. Who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman when the time comes for the discussion. The Chair can not recognize now amendments to be voted upon until after the ten minutes' debate.

Mr. ROGERS. But who has the floor for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not recognized any gentleman for that purpose, but recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] to have his amendment read.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. I insist that under the rules of the House when a gentleman proposes an amendment he has a right to be heard on it, and that the Chair has no right to say that he is not to be heard until somebody else offers an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this section of the bill and all amendments thereto has been limited by the House to ten minutes.

Mr. HAMMOND. That simply destroys debate after ten minutes' debate, and allows the other amendments to come in afterward and be voted upon without debate. The Chair, for his own convenience or from his idea of the convenience of the House, has suggested that all other amendments come in first. The gentleman from Arkansas has stated that as to whether he will introduce other amendments or not depends upon whether the first shall have been adopted by the committee. That same idea may influence other gentlemen in offering amendments; and I submit that it simply confuses—with all due respect for the Chair—it simply confuses the matter of amendments to adopt the suggestion which the Chair has made, that all must come in before the debate begins.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs leave to differ with the gentleman from Georgia as to the matter of confusion. Gentlemen, in the opinion of the Chair, ought to have permission to discuss any important amendment that may be proposed in the ten minutes, and for the purpose of enabling them to do that in good faith the Chair thought it better that the amendments should be offered and read now for information.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the Chair permit me to ask him whether it will undertake to determine what gentlemen may do in good faith?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not undertake to do that.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then who can?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has simply asked gentlemen, or rather stated that it would recognize them, to offer amendments now to be read for the information of the committee.

Mr. HAMMOND. The Chair stated that it would recognize gentlemen because it was important that important amendments and those made in good faith should be debated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought it right to recognize any gentleman who desired to be recognized for the purpose of offering his amendment before the discussion began.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is that I had the recognition of the Chair; and I want to know now by what authority the Chair can take me off the floor until I have had my five minutes' debate under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Arkansas to submit an amendment, not for discussion.

Mr. ROGERS. But what right has the Chair to dispense with the rule by a mere statement of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Arkansas had stated he desired to be recognized for the purpose of addressing the committee, the Chair would have stated he was under obligation to recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], who offered an amendment last evening, which was not read but was considered as pending. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "arbitration," in the second line of the fifth section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Shall receive a compensation of $10 a day for the time actually employed; that the clerk appointed by the said tribunal of arbitration shall receive the same fees and compensation as clerks of the United States circuit courts and district courts receive for like services; that the stenographer shall receive as full compensation for his services 20 cents for each folio of one hundred words of testimony taken and reduced to writing before said arbitrators; that United States marshals or other persons serving the process of said tribunal of arbitration shall receive the same fees and compensation for such services as they would receive for like services upon process issued by United States commissioners; that witnesses attending before said tribunal of arbitration shall receive the same fees as witnesses attending before United States commissioners; that all of said fees and compensation shall be payable by the United States in like manner as fees and compensation are payable in criminal causes under existing law: Provided, That the said tribunal of arbitration shall have power to limit the number of witnesses in each case where fees shall be paid by the United States: And provided further, That the fees and compensation of the arbitrators, clerks, stenographers, marshals, and others, for services of process, and witnesses under this act, shall be examined and certified by the United States district judge of the district in which the arbitration is held before they are presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department for settlement, and shall then be subject to the provisions of section 846 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. And a sufficient sum to pay all expenses under this act, and to carry the same into effect, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize any other gentleman who desires to offer an amendment at this time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri by adding at the end of it the amendment I offered yesterday evening.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the same amendment that the gentleman offered yesterday?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It is the same with a slight verbal change.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And if either of said parties to the said award, or any one or more of them, fail or refuse to abide or perform the same, the said award may be presented by said board of arbitrators or other person interested therein to the district or circuit court of the United States for the district where the said controversy arose, or where the award was made, and the same shall be made of record; and the said board shall report therewith the costs and expenses of said arbitrament, and judgment therefor shall be given by said court against said refusing party or parties, and collected as other judgment, and the sum recovered shall be paid into the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. If no further amendment is offered the Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to say anything further on the merits or demerits of the pending bill. At the outset I will say I am authorized by the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge to state that the amendment which has been offered by myself is acceptable to the committee and by them accepted. It simply carries out the purposes had by the committee in section 5, by fixing definitely the compensation to be paid to the arbitrators, to the clerk, to the stenographer, to the marshal, and to the witnesses connected with the arbitration. And as I understood from the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] it covers fully that amendment, save as to one point.

My amendment, which the committee accepts, provides that the fees and compensation shall be approved by the judge of the district court of the United States in the district in which the arbitration is had. It further provides that when so approved they then shall be subject to the provisions of section 846 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which makes the same provision as to the accounts of United States attorneys, marshals, and United States commissioners. That is, in short, that they are to be re-examined by the accounting officers of the Treasury before they are paid. It throws around them all the guards that are thrown around the taxation and payment of fees to any United States officer.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Yes, sir; but my time is very limited.

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman's amendment limit the number of witnesses?

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I am coming to that. The amendment further provides that the board of arbitration may determine and limit the number of witnesses that shall be examined before the tribunal of arbitration at the expense of the United States. It does not say whether that number shall be two, three, or four; and any lawyer, I apprehend, will understand that in the trial of controversies we can not set down a fixed rule that only two, three, or four witnesses shall be examined. You must leave that discretion to the tribunal, the same as you leave it to the judges of your United States courts. They can determine, they can limit the number of witnesses to be examined, as your United States commissioners can do.

My amendment also provides that the stenographer shall receive 20 cents for each folio of one hundred words of the testimony taken and reduced to writing before the commissioners. That is the exact amount of the fees now allowed to a United States commissioner for performing like duties. It provides that the clerk appointed by the arbitrators shall receive like fees and compensation as the clerk of a United States court; that is, a per diem and the fee for swearing the witnesses and for other matters pertaining to the discharge of the duties of his office. And the United States marshal or other party designated to serve the process of the board shall receive the same fees as are paid for like services before United States commissioners.

Every provision as to the fixing of fees is carefully guarded. And then the amendment makes an appropriation of an amount sufficient to meet all the expenses of carrying the act into effect, so that nothing shall be left unfinished, but that all the necessary power and vitality shall be given to it, whatever force there may be in the act.

The only other point in the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] is to limit the number of witnesses to three, instead of leaving it as in the amendment accepted by the committee; but it would seem, with all due deference to the judgment of the gentleman, the wiser and the better course to leave that to the discretion of the board of arbitrators.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] please state the amount of the appropriation proposed by his amendment?

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I put no amount; I say an amount sufficient.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I regard this bill as a perfectly worthless bill, and, with the exception of the fifth section, I regard it as a perfectly harmless bill, unless it may be construed as taking a step in a wrong direction. The fifth section, however, submits a proposition which, it occurs to me, no legislative body on earth ought to sanction, unless it contains some such restriction as that proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] or myself.

When a man is arraigned in a district court of the United States for the crime of murder, the judge sitting in that case has the power, and it becomes his duty under the law, to determine upon the sworn application of the accused how many witnesses he shall be allowed at Government expense to enable him to make his defense. But here is a bill which undertakes to settle by arbitration a five-dollar dispute between the employé of a railroad company and that company, yet which puts it absolutely and unconditionally in the power of either the railroad company or its employés to summon and have paid by the United States an indefinite number of witnesses—a hundred or a thousand if you please.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. The gentleman's suggestion is based upon the assumption that the board of arbitrators would be in collusion with the railroad company for the purpose of robbing the Treasury.

Mr. ROGERS. My answer to that suggestion is this: If you admit that this bill is susceptible of the construction which I place upon it, and no one can truthfully deny it, that of itself is a sufficient condemnation of the bill.

Can we recognize the principle that any one railroad employé, and that without reference to his character or his grievance, and any railroad corporation engaged in interstate commerce, smarting under some real or imaginary grievance, may have the right and the power to go into an arbitration of their differences and have and use the process of the Government at will and to any extent, all at the expense of the Government? Can such a bill meet the approbation of this body? Such is the proposition this bill presents, and, Mr. Chairman, it is not one arbitration, it is not ten arbitrations, it is not five hundred arbitrations that may be had under this bill, but an indefinite number at innumerable places, and all this at the expense of the tax-payers for the benefit of one single class of persons in this country, namely, that class engaged in railroading.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Does this amendment give to three men acting together, two of them being required to make a decision, any greater power than is given to a United States commissioner who occupies the same relative position as a justice of the peace?

Mr. ROGERS. A United States commissioner and a justice of the peace are both responsible to some recognized and responsible power. The former is appointed by and is immediately under the supervision of the United States judge, who can remove him for any abuse of the trust at will. The latter are responsible to the people who elect them, and to the law, which provides for punishment and disgrace for any abuse of trust or dishonest practices, and are subject at will to the control of appellate tribunals in all their doings. But who are these commissioners responsible to? To nobody and to no power. That is the difference. If the bill is constitutional (I can not think it possible) these arbitrators are absolutely free and unrestrained within the scope of their powers, and they are absolutely unrestrained in the expenditure of the public money.

How are they appointed? One by the employer and one by the employé, and the two thus selected select the third. When organized, the commission can sit as long as it pleases, summon as many witnesses as it pleases, have clerk and stenographer, take down all the evidence and on whatever subjects are presented, and finally, when the award is made and the United States has paid all the costs and expense, including witness fees, the award is confessedly a nullity, for want of any power lodged anywhere to enforce it.

It is said public opinion will enforce the award. Mr. Chairman, that answer is a confession of the utter worthlessness of this bill, and for this reason: the bill does not provide for compulsory arbitration. If that was what was desired this bill does not propose it. The arbitration proposed by the bill is to be had by mutual consent. That character of arbitration is in vogue now, and has been for years, by labor organizations. Certainly this bill gives nothing new in that direction. Then what does it give? Mr. Chairman, it gives the public money to both parties to conduct an arbitration, which, when had and the award is made, can not be enforced. That is what it gives, and that is all it gives.

Whose money is it that it is proposed to squander in this way? Where did it come from? It is the people's money, not those engaged in railroading alone, but all the fifty million people in these United States, and it is the proceeds of honest labor, the gatherings of an onerous and grinding taxation. This is class legislation, the most reckless and indefensible I have ever known proposed. Indefensible upon any ground, because the very organizations its advocates propose to benefit by it will find it turned upon them for their destruction. They will not only have to fight the gigantic corporations themselves, but those corporations will be supported by the Treasury of the United States.

Sir, the laboring men are solving this problem of a fair division of the profits of labor and capital for themselves. In their desperate struggle against tremendous odds the greatest obstacles they have encountered has been Federal authority.

The greatest friend they have had when they have been guided by wise counsel, conservative advice, and sober judgment, has been the sympathy and moral support of all just men.

They can not afford to demand or accept an unjust bill; a bill that offends the sense of justice of the great classes, similarly situated, but who are not embraced in it, and yet classes that sympathize with them in their struggle for a higher manhood and a nobler being. But, sir, if these labor organizations are unwisely led into this scheme of settling their disputes and indorse and invoke this system of arbitration, why should we not extend it to every class of laborers in this country. Why not extend it to the printers, the steamboatmen, the factory men and women, the miners, the day laborers on the farms, ay, the farmers themselves, who have their complaints and their grievances against these very same corporations for extortionate charges upon their shipments of cotton and wheat.

Sir, when we go back to our constituency, for instance to an agricultural people like mine, to a constituency who from early morn till night labor in the field, earning their bread in honest sweat, how shall we defend this bill? Shall we say to them that it is like the tariff, another plan of taxing the whole people for the benefit of a class? Shall we say to them that, added to the millions of acres of the public domain granted to the corporations, we have turned over to those same corporations the keys of the Treasury so far as may be necessary to enable them to litigate or arbitrate their differences with their employés?

Mr. Chairman, I shall not have to defend this bill. I shall never vote for it in the shape it is in or in any shape it is likely to assume under the present temper of this House. I shall vote against it, whatever the consequences may be. I am glad I can do so without fear of disfavor from any quarter. I am glad I can do so with the full approbation of my conscience and my judgment. I am glad I can do so in the full belief that I am upholding the Constitution of the country.

I congratulate myself that in my vote I can afford to stand with the two gentlemen on this floor who are best entitled to be heard on this question. I allude to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] and Mr. FORAN, of Ohio. In the debate on yesterday the former said:

> I listened with interest to the remarks made this morning by my friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAN]. He and I are the two, and the only two, representatives of skilled labor in this country who hold seats on this floor, the only two entitled to speak here for two great unions of skilled mechanics. And I may say I had the honor to be the chief executive officer of the grandest union of skilled labor America has ever seen—the printers of this country.
> Now I wish to say, and I say it frankly, I say it with a knowledge of how my trade is organized and the methods by which we arbitrate, that such a bill as this presented to the printers of the United States and Canada would not be accepted. We have for thirty years paid our own expenses. It has cost in time and wages millions of money to reach the point attained that the proprietor must arbitrate or the strike comes. We do not intend to invoke statutory enactments while we have the brains and the vantage-ground to place our grievances first before the aggrieved and the board and then before the general public.

The gentleman from New York will perhaps vote for this bill as an experiment, but admits it is not acceptable. He puts the welfare of labor on safer grounds—its own intelligence, conservatism, and power. I believe that to be the true ground. The latter said:

> Upon more mature reflection, however, and after hearing the views of gentlemen who have discussed it upon this floor, I am constrained to say I can not vote for it, harmless as I supposed it was.

Again he said:

> I have been a trade unionist myself, and for years was the executive officer of a large national labor organization, and I believe I know what are the aspirations, the hopes, desires, and wants of organized labor; and certainly a measure which would drive the strong arm of the law into the unions and assemblies of labor is not wanted or desired. There is a gentleman on the other side of this House, the member from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR], who has been the executive officer of one of the most intelligent labor organizations of this country, the Typographical Union, and I believe he feels as I do upon this phase of the bill, for he has an amendment which he thinks will cure that defect in the bill. But it will not.

The gentleman from Ohio, with all his experience and devotion to these labor organizations, will not support this bill. Can I not afford to stand by him on this issue, so near and dear to him?

I find on the other side of this question gentlemen who are identified with some of the largest railroad interests in America. They are the advocates of this bill. I do not impugn their motives or question their conduct. This bill may bring good to both, and they may be solicitous for that good. I believe it an enemy to labor and an enemy to the people. I do not see that any interest I desire to promote can be subserved by it. Still, I believe it will pass, and therefore I shall endeavor in every conceivable way to throw around this bill something in the shape of safeguards against the reckless waste of public money; but when every safeguard that can be thrown around it is thrown around it, then, in behalf of labor, in behalf of honest government, in behalf of a fair trial, in behalf of the large agricultural interests which I have the honor to represent here, I shall vote against the bill, let the result be what it may.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill shall become a law, I shall watch with curious interest operations under it. I predict it will prove a dead letter in the end, if not a snare in the beginning. If any good shall come of it to oppressed labor I shall be glad, though I can not sanction the means by which it will be brought about. I believe in the doctrine of letting every tub stand on its own bottom. I believe in every citizen bearing his just share of the burdens of Government economically administered. I do not believe in taxing all for any class. I do not believe in taxing the farmer for the railroad employés, or vice versa.

I believe every dollar of taxes should go to the legitimate purposes of Government, the public debt be paid off, interest stopped, and taxes reduced. We shall never do either if we squander our resources. The treasury that is exhausted in reckless expenditures can only be filled by crime. For it is a crime to demand greater taxes from an already impoverished people than public exigency requires. The worst legislation ever enacted springs from some great excitement or popular craze like the strike now existing in the Southwest. I counsel labor this class of legislation can do it no good.

The evil is the growth of twenty years of a vicious system of legislation and taxation, whereby the rich have grown richer and the poor poorer.

The real remedy is in equal laws. To this it must come. Step by step to this it is coming, slowly, it is true, but coming nevertheless. These periods of excitement, these abnormal condition of things, mark epochs of progress in the right direction. These upheavals of society rightly understood show that society is rebelling against unjust oppressions and demanding just and humane treatment. In that society is the inherent power to remedy the evils.

Let us trust its great forces. They are ample, all-sufficient, encouraged as they will be by an honest public sentiment. The remedy thus furnished will be the true one, and the adjustment made the right one.

The two temporary enemies, labor and capital, will thus be brought to a true understanding of their mutual dependence, and each obtain its just reward. The friendship thus formed will rest on a sure foundation, and the best results be attained.

Mr. O'DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill under discussion is a wise one, and I had hopes it would be approved as it came from the committee. The objection to it is that it does not go far enough; it is evident from the temper of the House that no better act can be passed at present. The laboring people have looked to Congress for some relief, and they are offered the bill reported by the Committee on Labor. This bill is a step in advance, for labor will take hope when it sees that the Representatives of the people are giving attention to their wants. By passing this bill you recognize that the toilers shall have redress for what they feel are accumulated wrongs. Unfortunately no provision is made to prevent, if such a thing were possible, the proverbial and inevitable delays of the law which might work injustice. There is an easy solution of the troubles that now afflict the country. Labor is a giant who has commenced to realize his strength.

In view of the past and the too-frequent monopolistic tendencies of capital this bill is, in a measure, a step toward the restraint of that vast and oft unscrupulous power which is one of the perils of the times. Public opinion will enforce this act, for that power will make all yield to the touch of necessity. Dissatisfaction has been growing in this country for years, and labor, to protect its rights, has organized so thoroughly that now it feels that "an injury to one is the concern of all." It comes to us and states it only asks for justice. If you pass this bill, granting that it is crude in many ways and hastily formulated, you do away with the antagonism between capital and labor, which, under the breath of artful demagogues is readily blown into fury. This bill is not unjust to capital, but aims to equally protect its rights. Generally capital is able to take care of itself. In the past it has had the aid of law.

The strikes which have paralyzed business can hardly be explained. The labor organizations are founded on the principle of arbitration, their cardinal doctrine being to avoid strikes. Arbitration is one of the most peaceful of conquests over difficulties. It is not new to the world. The old countries have tried this method for years with excellent results. In England, under William III, in 1698, submission to arbitration was authorized and made equivalent in force to the decision of a jury. Later, under William IV, in 1833, "submission to arbitration could be made the rule of any court of law or equity," the arbitrators having the power to compel the attendance of witnesses. In the same country, in 1854, judges could order compulsory arbitration, and in 1872 the master and workman arbitration act was passed.

I have called your attention to the attitude the English Government occupied to meet this difficulty. In France, as long ago as 1452 and 1464, the conseils de prudhommes, composed of masters and workmen, arbitrated disputes, and in 1806 these trade tribunals were accorded enlarged powers. The influence of these acts has been only for good, and we expect the same results in America if this bill is passed. Prudent men here as in France know the wisdom of such provision of law. The people will hold that a measure designed only to promote harmony and justice can not be in conflict with the organic law of the land.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the committee has been severely and harshly criticised by gentlemen on this floor. It is much easier to play the critic than the statesman; it is easier to pull down than to build up; it is more pleasing to oppose, at times, than to propose.

Not one of these carping gentlemen have offered anything better than the bill proposes. The difficulty we encounter is in the subject-matter itself. As was well said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN] the wage question has been the problem of the ages. Many remedies have been proposed, but so far none of them has proven successful.

In my humble judgment the remedy does not lie in legislation. The evil is too deep-seated to be reached by the enactment of laws alone. Laws may aid in the solution, but alone they are ineffectual. Capital and labor must be the factors in the solution of the problem; they must be harmonized; they must learn that their mutual dependence upon each other is such that when one suffers the other must; that strikes, lockouts, and wholesale discharge of employés are not remedies, but only an aggravation of the disease; that the rights of one are the duties of the other.

The problem to us is especially difficult by reason of the constitutional restrictions and limitations which control our action as a legislative body. This bill does not transcend any constitutional provision or safeguard. It seeks to bring capital and labor together with a view to settling their differences and controversies as set forth in the first section of the bill. It provides a method by which the parties may settle by arbitration all their disputes. Who will say that that is not a humane and praiseworthy object?

It is true there is nothing in the bill that is legally compulsory. Its provisions are rather hortatory than compulsory, advisory rather than mandatory, a declaration of Congress of its views and wishes as well as of its interest in this struggle of labor for protection against oppression and injustice. It will give force to the views of those writers on the subject who have recommended amicable or voluntary arbitration. It is in accordance with the views of Mayor Powderly, who is doing for the cause of labor in this country what Parnell is doing for home rule in Ireland.

The laboring men of the country are to be congratulated that they have such a wise, moderate, and candid leader. He is doing more to-day for the solution of the labor question than all the laws you can enact will do. The cause of labor has suffered much from bad leadership. It needed, more than anything else, a man candid enough and brave enough to give it sound advice. Such a friend it has in Mr. Powderly.

The lawyers on this floor who have opposed this measure have done so because it is not more compulsory in its features; because it does not provide for the enforcement of the award that may be found by the arbitrators. They have discussed this bill as if the matters coming before the board of arbitrators were cognizable in the ordinary courts of law; that its judgment or award would have to be in dollars and cents. Such a view of the problem shows an entire misconception on the part of these gentlemen.

These disputes or controversies referred to in the bill do not relate to existing contracts, either expressed or implied; if they did, the parties to them would have ample remedies in the State and Federal courts.

If a railroad company makes a contract to pay a man so much a day, or that he shall labor so many hours for a day's work, there can be no trouble about that. It is a contract enforceable in every State in the Union. What are the subjects to which this bill refers? To unjust or oppressive treatment, either as to wages or hours of labor. It is well known that these questions of wages and hours of labor are the fruitful sources of controversies and strikes.

No one claims that Congress has the power or the right to say to a railroad company or to a laborer so many hours shall constitute a day's work or so many dollars shall constitute a month's wages. But because we have not that power, must we stand silently by and see all trade and business paralyzed without even the suggestion of a remedy?

There has been no tribunal yet provided by law for the enforcement of treaty obligations. Yet we do not on that account cease to make treaties with other nations. For the nation in these days which will not respect its treaty obligations would be condemned by the universal sentiment of all other Christian nations.

We are obliged by public sentiment to keep our promises made to some weak, insignificant tribe of uncivilized Indians. Why? Because the enlightened Christian sentiment of this nation will not any longer tolerate bad faith on our part in dealing with the Indians. This same sentiment, which is mightier than law, more effective than a writ of execution issued out of any court of justice, will surely and certainly enforce the execution of the award of this board of arbitrators. Some Jay Gould, intrenched behind millions of wealth and a railway system almost omnipotent to oppress labor, may refuse to perform an award made against his interests; but he will have to face an outraged public sentiment, and the people may become silent if not approving spectators to a contest which will scatter these millions to the winds and make the stocks and franchises of a great railway system valueless.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I should do injustice to my own convictions if I failed to express my hearty approval of this bill. Its chief excellence to my view consists in the fact that it is a simple legislative recognition of the principle of arbitration in the settlement of the grave and menacing industrial difficulties which are now so generally occurring. I believe the application of this principle to be the one peaceful and efficacious remedy for existing evils. In the settlement of private disputes it has from time immemorial been successfully employed; it has in later time been invoked in Europe in just such difficulties as now beset us, with the best results, and on a larger scale in the adjustment of international complications, it is earnestly anticipated by the philanthropist and statesman as the one method which will avert the horrors of war, dispense with the necessity for standing armies—those costly engines of oppression—and secure the brotherhood of nations.

This principle is in harmony with our ideas of government and the spirit of our people. Being voluntary and the result of agreement, it preserves the self-respect as well as the rights and interests of each party and provides for gracious and mutual concession. In this way it appeases angry feeling and tends to prevent future controversy. To this beneficent principle Congress gives its sanction and adds the immense moral force of its legislative approbation. It clothes, also, this voluntary arbitration with the power to secure that full investigation which is essential to an intelligent and just decision. And here it stops, just where it should stop, by placing the parties in the presence of their own conscience and honor of their duties as law-abiding citizens, and in the presence of public opinion, that subtle, invisible, all-penetrating, and irresistible force which no man and no body of men and no interest or body of interests can defy with impunity. Depend upon it, Mr. Chairman, this bill, in simply providing this remedy, will have greater force and will meet the exigencies of our time more adequately than if it bristled with pains and penalties—pains and penalties which would be impossible of enforcement.

You can not indict a people, and you can not punish thousands of discontented human beings—who are themselves citizens—and who wield in the ballot a weapon for offense and defense more potent than Jove's thunderbolt.

Laws which clearly define rights and corresponding duties are in large degree self-enforcing, resembling those natural forces which equally control the minutest atoms of matter and the grandest phenomena of the universe.

I say, therefore, that in the apparent weakness of this bill is its real strength. Mutual consent is the basis of its action, and it has no coercive features; it interferes with no other mode of settlement or with the proceedings of any other tribunal, and does not attack the integrity or rights of any organization. It is urged that this bill is unconstitutional, and the same objection is made against any legislation in aid of our material interest or intended to promote the prosperity and happiness of the people.

We reply, that when commerce between the States is obstructed; when passenger and freight trains on important lines of communication stand idly on the tracks for many days and thousands of workmen are unemployed; when all business depending upon interstate transportation suffers, that in this exigency the commerce clause of the Constitution clearly authorizes remedial action by Congress. It is also contended by the opponents of this bill that national legislation when once invoked will be in the interest of capital and dangerous to public rights. This is, in other words, saying that the representatives and servants of the people will betray their trusts and become the allies of capital and the enemies of labor in any conflict which may arise.

This imputation upon the probable course of Congress is so gross and unfounded that it needs no refutation. No laboring man can mistake the purpose of this bill, or fail to see that in protecting his interests now Congress has given a guarantee of its future policy—a policy which will be animated by a purpose to prevent antagonism between employer and employed, and to protect by wise and humane legislation the important interests with which it is intrusted.

I congratulate the committee on the wise and fortunate result of their labors, which I believe will be accepted by the parties to these controversies, and will do much toward ending these unhappy industrial struggles, which should be promptly terminated in order that the business of the country may again resume its accustomed activity, and the blessings which attend peaceful industry and fairly rewarded labor may again visit us.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House for debate upon this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SOWDEN. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose in due time. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], which was offered last evening.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am aware that debate has been closed by order of the House, but I want to ask unanimous consent of the committee to occupy just one minute.

I concur in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], but I desire to add to it a proposition which I submitted yesterday, and which I now reintroduce, because I am informed it was not distinctly heard or generally understood by the Committee of the Whole when submitted last evening. The effect of my proposition is that if either of the parties who have invoked the arbitration should refuse to acquiesce in the result, the costs paid by the people out of the national Treasury shall be reimbursed by a judgment against such refusing party; that judgment for the costs shall be entered against the party refusing to abide by the award, and when collected shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask by what court judgment is to be entered and by what means the judgment is to be enforced.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The purpose is that judgment shall be entered and enforced as other judgments are.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. In what court will the judgment be entered?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. In a United States court—either a circuit or district court of the United States within whose jurisdiction the controversy arises or the award is made.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. By what process is the court to ascertain the costs—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, the following:

"And if either of the parties to said award, or any one or more of them, fail or refuse to abide or perform the same, the said award may be presented by said board of arbitrators or other person interested therein to the district or circuit court of the United States for the district where the said controversy arose, or where the award was made, and the same shall be made of record, and the said board shall report therewith the costs and expenses of said arbitrament, and judgment therefor shall be given by said court against said refusing party or parties, and collected as other judgments, and the sum recovered shall be paid into the Treasury."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon this amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment offered by Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, to the amendment of Mr. WARNER, of Missouri, there were—ayes 51, noes 51.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair votes in the negative; and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I make the point that no quorum has voted. The vote of the Chair does not make a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposed he had a right to vote. At any rate, the amendment not having received a majority of the votes cast, was lost before the Chair had voted.

Mr. HAMMOND. But I understand the question of a quorum is raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is raised that no quorum has voted; and the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 92.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, and Mr. CRAIN. We accept that.

Mr. SOWDEN. I desire to move an amendment. The proviso of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri provides that "said tribunal of arbitration shall have power to limit the number of witnesses in each case where fees shall be paid by the United States." I move to amend by inserting after the words "United States" the words "to the number of six witnesses on each side."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

Provided, That no commission organized under this act shall remain in session at the instance of any railroad company in the investigation of any case for more than nine months in any one year.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 13, noes 46.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

Provided, That no railroad corporation shall have subpœnaed and paid by the United States in any case more than one hundred witnesses whose testimony shall bear on any given point.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. This amendment shows the sincerity of the gentleman offering it.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

Provided, That there shall not be more than fifty of such tribunals of arbitration in session at any one time.

Mr. LOWRY. I rise to a point of order. For the purpose of characterizing that amendment as I think it should be, I wish to say with all deference to my friend from Arkansas——

Mr. ROGERS and others. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman from Indiana to debate the proposition. The Chair understood he rose to a point of order.

Mr. LOWRY. I make the point of order that the amendment is purely frivolous.

Mr. ROGERS. A frivolous amendment is always germane to a frivolous bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a point of order. That is a question for the Committee of the Whole to decide.

Mr. TUCKER obtained the floor.

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has been recognized for the same purpose, as the Chair infers.

Mr. TUCKER. No; I wish to be heard on this bill. I suppose I can not be heard on it now. Can I offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose at the proper time.

Mr. TUCKER. Very well. I will move to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment at the Clerk's desk already pending.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understood the Chair to decide that a frivolous amendment was not germane to this bill. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

The question recurred on Mr. ROGERS'S amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment in good faith and by unanimous consent. I hope I will be permitted to explain it for one minute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, Not exceeding $1,000 shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States to defray the expenses of any single arbitration under this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks for one minute to explain his amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be some limit to the expense to be incurred by these arbitrations, or otherwise there would be liability to great abuse. A political party or a railroad company or strikers might lay a heavy hand upon the public purse. And there is no use talking, sir, if this large body, one thousand miles away from the striking voters, is afraid of them, what can you expect of three arbitrators in the very presence of the strikers? They would summon every witness asked to be summoned. And the strikers, unfortunately, when they got tired of working, could get up a free circus at the expense of the Government. [Laughter.] There ought to be some limit. If not $1,000 then let it be $2,000, or $3,000, or $4,000. The bill is a farce at best in that there is no penalty to punish anybody for disregarding its provisions. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

The question recurred on Mr. TILLMAN'S amendment to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 54.

Mr. CRAIN demanded tellers.

Mr. BRUMM. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum having been made, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. TILLMAN and Mr. CRAIN.

Mr. CRAIN. Will it be in order now to ask, by unanimous consent, for one minute to speak on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing.

Mr. CRAIN. I merely wanted to say—— [Cries of "Regular order!"] We will show you the same courtesy hereafter.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 62.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further provided, That the "tribunal of arbitration" shall sit from day to day until the award is made.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask by unanimous consent to have one minute.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The regular order was called upon us after we gave unanimous consent to your side.

Mr. WHEELER'S amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, Witness' fees shall not be allowed and paid by the United States, in any case, for more than three witnesses on each side, whose testimony shall be directed to any given point; and all fees shall be certified by the commission to the district judge of the United States of the district in which the commission is held, who shall tax and certify the same as fees in cases before said court.

Mr. WHEELER. I offer the following amendment to that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this shall not apply to any case when either party to the controversy makes affidavit that the witnesses proposed by them are necessary to a fair arbitration.

Mr. ROGERS. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. ROGERS'S amendment as modified was disagreed to.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to strike out "ten" and insert "six dollars a day for the pay of commissioners."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Do not insist on that. They do not get traveling expenses.

Mr. CUTCHEON. At the suggestion of some members of the committee I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BRUMM. "Common carriers" in the title of the bill should be stricken out and "railroad companies" inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments to the title come in after the bill has been passed.

Mr. CRAIN. I give notice I shall demand a separate vote and the yeas and nays in the House on Mr. TILLMAN'S amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7479) to provide for the speedy settlement of controversies and differences between common carriers engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I now ask the previous question upon the amendments and upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the amendments reported by the committee. Are separate votes demanded?

Mr. CRAIN. I demand a separate vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], on which I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that to have been an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri; and the whole amendment must be voted upon if a separate vote is demanded. If no gentleman desires a separate vote upon any other amendments, the Chiar will submit all of them in gross.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole be read.

The amendments were severally reported.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not understand from the reading of the amendments by the Clerk what disposition had been made of that amendment with reference to providing that the fees of witnesses shall be paid as they are paid in criminal cases in United States courts. If that amendment has been adopted by the committee I demand a separate vote upon it, as it will destroy the whole bill. The bill will be entirely worthless with that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the lines to which the gentleman from Ohio refers. The Chair will state that they are parts of a long amendment, an entire amendment, agreed to in Committee of the Whole, and it can not be divided.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all of said fees and compensation shall be paid by the United States in like manner as fees and compensation are payable in criminal causes under existing laws, &c.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair has stated, this is a portion of a very long amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I ask unanimous consent to substitute the word "civil" for the word "criminal" in this connection.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. That would not answer the purpose, because the fees of witnesses in civil causes are not paid by the United States

Mr. ROGERS. I object to the change.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I demand a separate vote upon that whole amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I demand a separate vote upon the amendment striking out the words "common carriers" in the bill and inserting the words "railroad companies."

The SPEAKER. If there be no other separate vote demanded than the three mentioned by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], the remaining amendments will be voted upon in gross.

The remaining amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment upon which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 4 of the first section of the bill, the words "common carriers" and insert the words "railroad companies."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 73, noes 14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next amendments upon which a separate vote is demanded by the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Ohio are embraced in the one amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole, which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 5, strike out all after the word "arbitration," in the second line, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Shall receive a compensation of $10 a day for the time actually employed. That the clerk appointed by said tribunal of arbitration shall receive the same fees and compensation as clerks of the United States circuit courts and district courts receive for like services. That the stenographer shall receive, as full compensation for his services, 20 cents for each folio of an hundred words of testimony taken and reduced to writing before said arbitrators. That the United States marshals, or other persons serving the process of said tribunal of arbitration, shall receive the same fees and compensation for such services as they would receive for like services upon processes issued by United States commissioners. That witnesses attending before said tribunal of arbitration shall receive the same fees as witnesses attending before United States commissioners. That all of said fees and compensation shall be payable by the United States in like manner as fees and compensation are payable in criminal cases under existing laws: Provided, That the said tribunal of arbitration shall have power to limit the number of witnesses in each case where fees shall be paid by the United States: Provided further, That the fees and compensation of the arbitrators, clerks, stenograpers, marshals, and others, for service of processes and witnesses under this act, shall be examined and certified by the United States district judge of the district in which the arbitration is held before they are presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department for settlement, and shall there be subject to the provisions of section 846 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and a sufficient sum of money to pay all expenses under this act, and to carry the same into effect, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; Provided, however, That not exceeding $1,000 shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States to defray the expenses of any single arbitration under this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. This disposes of all the amendments.

Mr. BRUMM. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRUMM. I understood the Clerk in reading the last amendment to include the $1,000 amendment.

The SPEAKER. He did. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reported this as an entire amendment.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union amended that section, and it comes to the House as one amendment.

Mr. BRUMM. Can we not have a separate vote on the $1,000 clause? It was a distinct amendment.

The SPEAKER. The House can not go over the proceedings in Committee of the Whole to ascertain how amendments were voted upon there. This is reported as one amendment.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SPRINGER. As my friend from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] seems to be engaged at this moment, I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT. I ask to be recognized for a motion to recommit.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Would it be in order to move to refer this bill to a select committee, to be appointed by the Speaker, at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. Under the rules of the House it is in order to move to commit to a standing committee or a select committee. But the Chair thinks that means a select committee already existing. The House can not now proceed to create a committee for the purpose of referring the bill to it.

Mr. SKINNER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SKINNER. Is it in order to move now to commit this bill to the Committee on Education?

The SPEAKER. It is in order to move to commit the bill, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has sent up a resolution to that effect, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. CRAIN. I wish to say, the gentleman who proposed to make that motion must be an enemy to the bill, and must desire to kill it.

The Clerk read the resolution offered by Mr. HEWITT, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Labor, with instructions to report in lieu thereof a concurrent resolution expressive of the sense of the Congress that so far as may be practicable all controversies between employers and employés should be submitted to arbitration either by voluntary agreement or in accordance with law.

The question being taken on the motion to commit with instructions, there were—ayes 37, noes 96.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SKINNER. I desire now to make the motion I stated a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. One motion to commit has been made, and that is all that is permitted under the rules of the House. The question now is on ordering the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. BRUMM called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 199, nays 30, not voting 94; as follows:

YEAS—199.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. COLLINS, is necessarily absent. He is paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] on all political questions. This not being a political question, if he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. STAHLNECKER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. BLISS, is unavoidably detained from the House. He is paired on all political questions, but if he were present he would vote "ay" on the passage of this bill.

Mr. MCADOO. My colleague, Mr. PIDCOCK, is unavoidably absent, owing to the death of a near relative. He is paired on all political questions with my other colleague, Mr. LEHLBACH, but this not being a political question Mr. LEHLBACH has voted "ay." Mr. PIDCOCK would, if present, vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. Mr. LEHLBACH has not voted.

Mr. MCADOO. I am informed that he is detained in his committee-room. He is in favor of the bill.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. WISE, is absent, and is paired on this bill. If he were present, he would vote for the bill.

On motion of Mr. JAMES, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. OATES with Mr. LIBBEY, for this day.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. BARBOUR with Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. HEWITT with Mr. HIRES, on this bill.

Mr. CATCHINGS with Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. CATCHINGS, if present, would vote for the bill, and Mr. DAVIDSON against it.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. BAKER, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. BEACH with Mr. CANDLER, on the labor arbitration bill. If present, Mr. BEACH would vote for the bill, and Mr. CANDLER against it.

Mr. TURNER with Mr. HERMAN, on this vote. If Mr. TURNER were present, he would vote against the bill.

Mr. CLEMENTS with Mr. FARQUHAR, on this vote. If present, he would vote "ay;" Mr. CLEMENTS "no."

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. VAN SCHAICK, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. BLISS. Mr. BLISS, I am informed, if present, would vote for this bill, and so would Mr. VAN SCHAICK.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. RIGGS, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HIRES, is paired; if he were present he would vote for this bill.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. STRUBLE, who is absent, is paired; but if he were present he would vote for this bill.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend the title of the bill.

Mr. BAYNE. I object, until I hear what the proposed amendment is.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so that it shall read as follows:
"A bill to provide a method for settling controversies and differences between railroad corporations engaged in interstate and Territorial transportation of property or passengers and their employés."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. O'NEILL. No objection, Mr. Speaker.
Mr. BAYNE. I object. I think the title is good enough.
Mr. BAYNE subsequently withdrew his objection; and the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 5690) for the free coinage of silver, and for other purposes.
Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House at half past 5 this afternoon take a recess until half past 7 p. m., the evening session to be devoted to debate upon this bill and no other business to be transacted.
There was no objection, and it was so ordered.
Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, the heated controversy now going on by extreme advocates on opposite sides of the gold and silver question is one not calculated to benefit the country or advance its prosperity. To the deliberate, contemplative citizen it has the look, on both sides, of having been inspired by selfish desires. To listen to the silver orator who owns the bonanza mines of the West one would think silver was the great desideratum. On the other hand, the class who can only look through golden glasses seem to have no doubt but that the suspension of our silver coinage is the one thing needful to insure prosperity. For one, I am disposed to believe that many in each one of these classes are inspired by personal interest. The one would reduce values beyond all precedent; the other expand to such an extent that stability would be unknown.
I am forced, therefore, to look about and endeavor to ascertain if there is not a more rational course to pursue, one not in the interest of contraction or inflation, the adoption of which will meet with the sober sentiment of the country. The United States, with the exception of about five years, has ever been a gold and silver country. It is thoroughly committed to bimetallism. These two metals have been used as money during all the ages and in this country ever since the adoption of the Constitution, which states that "no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts," and it is fair to presume that they always will be used for this purpose. We know as a fact that the market ratio between gold and silver has been greatly increased since 1873; that the actual ratio, instead of being from 1:15½ or 1:16, is now more than 1:20. This is not simply in the United States but wherever there is a market for the two metals throughout the world.
It is not necessary to discuss now the reasons for this difference between these metals, although we might say in passing that the action of the Latin Union, Germany, and the United States in 1873-'74 had more to do with causing this wide difference than any other cause. The question is, what shall be the policy of the United States? I shall assume in what I have to say that the time has not arrived for this country to consider the question from the single standpoint of our own country, but that as a great commercial nation it is our policy to consider the question from an international standpoint.
I admit that the time may come, and sooner than we now anticipate, when we must decide the question without reference to other countries. Under the Bland act of 1878 we have been coining about $2,000,000 per month. This is a forced coinage. Shall this law be permitted to remain for the present? Shall we have free coinage, or shall we suspend the coinage of silver? Theoretically I am for the free coinage of silver and gold, and I believe that our entire legislation should look to that end; but the question is, What shall we do at this session and what public policy should be pursued by our officials? There has been much said by the extremists that never should have been said. Gentlemen have stated on this floor that they were in favor of both metals, and yet every argument stated was against silver and in favor of gold.
There is a well-grounded apprehension that many of those who claim that they favor bimetallism and who demand as a means to that end the present suspension of silver coinage will, in that event, at once ally themselves with that class who favor the single gold standard, if they are not already in such alliance. Again, the arguments of those in favor of suspension are so ill-tempered. They originate as a rule from the money centers, and these champions assume a dictatorial and all-wise manner, and the suspicion is gaining currency, and there is reason for it, that suspension is a scheme to contract values and make the purchasing power of a dollar greater than heretofore.
The history of the bankers, money-holders of the East, and especially the business men of New York city, to whom my friend from New York [Mr. JAMES] delights to refer, during the past twenty years has not been such as to inspire confidence in the disinterestedness of their motives, and the opinion is fast becoming widespread that the people are fully as competent to determine the kind of money and its volume as bankers and Wall street. Many of the metropolitan papers seem to be in accord with the bankers in this demand for suspension, and as an illustration I will read an extract from a marked copy sent me of the New York Independent, dated March 4, 1886, a paper standing at the head of the list among papers of its class—a great paper, ably edited, but a paper that has done as much as any one other instrument in this country to cause a separation of the two metals.

GOVERNMENT MORALITY—SEVENTY-NINE-CENT DOLLARS.

We can not expect the people of this country to be very distinguished for their morality while the Government, by its laws and practices, is directly teaching immorality.
A man who passes a counterfeit coin composed in part of silver or gold and the balance of it in some inferior metal is called a swindler, and is very unceremoniously hustled off to prison. The Government of the United States, however, may cheat in that direction, and force the people to take millions of 79-cent dollars, and then claim that such counterfeit morality deserves the name of honesty. It proposes still to do, in the future, as it is now doing, an act even worse than this—it proposes not only to cheat the people by compelling them to take these 79-cent dollars, but to lie about them also by calling them dollars. It now says to the world that these swindling 79-cent coins shall be called, each and every one of them, "one dollar," and be so stamped on the face of every one of them. By this monumental immorality the Government of the United States of America is now, in the judgment of all honest men, the world over, entitled to the high rank of being called the chief counterfeiter and champion liar among all civilized and uncivilized nations. This is, to be sure, very plain talk; but it is nevertheless the solemn truth.

Upon what ground does this paper say "the Government of the Unted States of America is now, in the judgment of all honest men the world over, entitled to the high rank of being called the chief counterfeiter and champion liar among all civilized and uncivilized nations?" Perhaps the Independent and its followers will inform the country the name of the civilized country that issues a silver coin of greater intrinsic value than the United States. Do not such contraction advocates know that silver is as much the money of the world as gold, and that it is supreme nonsense for one, two, or three nations to attempt to permanently demonetize silver? If we wanted simply to make a silver speech we would say that silver is the money of the people throughout the world.
We find that nearly eight hundred million of the people of the world use silver only, less than two hundred million use gold and silver, and less than one hundred million use gold alone, as unlimited legal tender, and this last mentioned class uses a large amount of silver (limited) in order to carry on business affairs. Germany is put down in the tables as a gold country, yet she has one hundred and fifty millions of silver as a full legal tender. We would call attention to such papers as above mentioned which denounce this country as dishonest that in the United States the ratio between gold and silver is fixed at one pound of pure gold to sixteen pounds of pure silver, while in all Europe, which is held up to us as an example of "honesty," the ratio is one pound of gold to fifteen and one-half pounds of silver. The estimates of the statistician is that the amount of money in the world, silver and gold, is, gold, $3,513,000,000; silver, $3,750,000,000. That is about 48 per cent. gold and 52 per cent. silver. It will be seen that if the gold and silver were evenly distributed among the nations they would be about equally divided.
It is estimated by good authority that France has 60 per cent. gold and 40 per cent. silver; Germany 61 per cent. gold, 39 per cent. silver. In Belgium over 48 per cent. of the coin is silver; United States, 68 per cent. gold, 32 per cent silver. If we should bring our proportion of the two metals to the world's ratio of 52 of silver to 48 of gold we should need more than as much again silver as we have at present. The people need not be alarmed for fear that silver will be stricken down. In order to show the interest the world has in maintaining the two metals, I would call your attention to the following tables taken from the report of the silver commission of 1877, showing the kind of money used as a standard in different countries and their population. Since said date the relative positions of these countries has not been materially changed except our own country:

GOLD-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

Great Britain	32,000,000	Norway	1,700,000
Canada, Cape of Good Hope, and Australian Colonies	7,000,000	Sweden	4,300,000

Japan	33,000,000	Total	187,300,000
Holland	3,700,000

Why this charge of swindling on the part of our Government? Is it not true that there is as much pure silver in our dollar to-day, and ever has been during our history, as there was when first coined in 1792?

I desire to call attention, as a part of my argument, to the table furnished by the Director of the Mint, showing the stock of gold and silver coin and bullion in the principal countries of the world.

*Estimated by the Director of the Mint. †Wahrung's Politik, 1884. ‡Bank reserves only.

Next to the newspapers, of which the paper mentioned is an example, the associated national banks have ever since 1878 been hostile to the coinage of silver. It is reported that a president of one of the New York banks said, at the national bankers' convention at Louisville, Ky., in 1883, in referring to continued coinage, "That rather than have the outrage continue it would be better that the whole amount of those rejected dollars that now encumber the Treasury vaults should be sunk in the sea." These bankers—"business men"—referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES], when he said in the following modest words, "I have no doubt that if the business men had had the power to deal with the silver question the team of State would not have been stalled in the mire as it is now, and it is largely their fault that it is so, for they knew what the end would be," are wonderful prophets.

You can refer to scarcely a single financial movement of the Government during the war but what they held up their hands in holy horror and depicted the calamities to follow their adoption to the country. When the law-making power in 1878 said we would remonetize silver and coin from two to four million per month these same "business men" again looked wise and said it could not be done without utter and immediate financial ruin to the country. Yet we survived. The business men have never got it through their heads how it was accomplished in opposition to their business judgment. The fact is these bankers make a merchandise of money. They can not always be trusted when it comes to a question in which the whole people are interested as well as themselves. They are so in the habit of weighing everything on their own scales, leaving a portion of the proceeds in their own till, that they forget that other people have rights and need protection as well as themselves.

The fact is, these business men who are engaged in banking see the handwriting on the wall. They are fearful that the days of the present system of national banks are numbered, and they are striving in every possible way to continue the system. But they must go. The national debt will be paid, and soon the unnatural policy of banking on an interest-bearing debt and issuing circulating notes thereon will cease. If these business bankers had the sagacity claimed for them, they would accept the situation—they would say to the Government, keep coining silver, issue your certificates, and we will continue our banking based upon certificates, silver and gold instead of bonds. If this course was adopted, does any one doubt but that silver would be appreciated at once in value?

I do not desire to discuss this question from the standpoint of what is the interest of any particular class. I do not wish the question to arise, practically, as to the kind of money the creditors of the Government shall receive their pay. I want this nation to have such a stable currency that the question need never be asked as to the particular kind of money, but that its silver, its gold, and its paper circulation shall constitute a triune one, equally desired by the creditor as well as the debtor. The creditors of the Government have assumed much importance to themselves in the past. In 1868 the question became prominent as to how the 5-20 bonds should be paid. The owners of the bonds insisted that they should be paid in coin. A large class of our people then said that as these bonds had been purchased with legal-tender notes at par—that for $100 in greenbacks they received a one hundred-dollar bond drawing interest at 6 per cent. payable in coin, and that as the greenback when these bonds were purchased was only worth an average of 70 per cent. in coin—that it was equitable and right that the debtor could pay his bond in the same currency. The bondholder became furious. His righteous indignation swelled up within him as he insisted on receiving a currency worth much more than what he paid for his bond.

Mr. SHERMAN, who now seems to be a little demoralized as to silver, then said:

I think the bondholder violates his promise when he refuses to take the same kind of money he paid for the bonds.

The bondholders succeeded in their demands, and in 1869 Congress passed a law that the principal of the bonds should be paid in coin. In the refunding act of July 14, 1870, it was declared and printed on the back of each bond, "That it shall be paid in coin of the then standard value prescribed by law." Now, without criticising further their action or the action of Congress, I will say for one I shall stand by the letter of the present contract. While I would not say which kind of coin you shall take in payment of your bond, neither would I permit the bondholder to say the only kind of coin he would receive in payment. The standard of gold and silver July 14, 1870, when these bonds were refunded, was the same as now. The bondholder demanded coin; and coin of standard weight and fineness he shall receive. Why should he complain? The silver dollar to day is equal to the gold dollar in every private transaction in the United States, and practically convertible into a gold dollar at will of the holder.

The Government officials are adverse to the payment of the bonds. They seem to be wedded to a continuance of the present system of banking based on an interest-bearing debt. We find the Comptroller of the Currency for 1884 says, "It is a question if it would not be of ultimate benefit to the country and a payment of the debt to reduce the interest upon it to a minimum rate, and defer the payment of the principal, thus giving for many years a safe basis for national-bank circulation." This language is quoted with apparent indorsement by the last Comptroller of the Currency, under the present administration, on page 15 of his report. The Treasurer of the United States is violating his duty and oath of office in discriminating against silver. He complains that the vaults are full and overflowing. The people of the country are asking why he does not pay out this silver in the payment of bonds now subject to call. The following is the reference to the law under which these 5 per cent. bonds were issued:

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1881, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of February, May, August, and November, in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes and duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Also, on the face of the United States 4 per cent. bond, we find:

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1907, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of October, January, April, and July, in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

I quote the foregoing in connection with the action of the Government officials in discriminating against silver when it comes to the payment of debts, to show the reasons why silver has depreciated. It seems that the Government, bankers, and the money centers have done all in their power to break down silver. We shall see whether the wishes of the people shall be thwarted. During the war our Government paid its heavy coin payments in what was only a 96 or 97 cent gold dollar as measured by silver. Our suspension friends say that for years prior to 1865 there had been scarcely any silver coined. Why do they not give the reason? They know that it was because the bullion value of the silver dollar after the act of 1834 was between 3 and 4 per cent. over gold.

It can be easily shown that for the first one hundred years of this nation silver was subject to less fluctuation than gold. I have not the time to enter upon the comparison, but the student of history remembers that in 1834 Congress reduced the weight of the gold coins, taking over 6½ per cent. of standard gold out of each dollar that was coined after that date; and yet there was no complaint at the time, although the debtor class had the advantage of 6½ per cent. on all payments made in gold. If our "business" bankers of the present day had been on "earth" at that time we would have heard one eternal wail go up in regard to the obligation of contracts and the duty of the Government to pay in the highest metal. Probably Mr. Tilden, who at that time must have been nearing the close of his business life, and his associates, instead of purchasing foreign-gold exchange, as they are now reported as doing, were making their calling and election sure by investing in foreign-silver exchange. [Laughter.]

It may be of interest here to call attention to the following table, taken from The History of Bimetallism in the United States, by Laughlin, showing for a period of forty years, average gold equivalent of the silver dollar of 412½ grains, by years, according to our standard of 1:16:

Years.	Value in gold.	Years.	Value in gold.

1852	102.57	1872	102.25
1853	104.26	1873	100.46

This is a question that merits our careful consideration. Our debts and contracts are based upon gold and silver upon a relation of 16 to 1. Now, shall we contract the currency by suspending the coinage of one metal and thereby increase the purchasing power of money? Or rather, if there is to be a change, would it not be more fair and in the interest of the many to require a reduction of the bullion in the gold dollar, as has been done on more than one occasion during our history, or at least divide the disparity? Our friends of the opposition forget one thing—that gold has appreciated. It has been shown over and over again that silver will purchase as much of the commodities as at any time during the past twenty-five years. If we must make a change, let us be fair to the debtors. The indebtedness of this country is immense. Taking the United States—State, municipal, county—railroad and private debts, and it can not be less than $15,000,000,000. The private debts alone we can safely estimate at from eight to ten billion.

If a difference is to be made in favor of any class, why not look after the interest of this vast army of debtors who are striving in every possible way to lift the great weight of debt from their shoulders. When we find the money interest of the East all on one side you can not but know that a suspicion will arise among the great debtor class that there is danger of their interests being affected. I would not attempt to estimate the number of millions in mortgages on the farms in Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas held by Eastern money-lenders, but it aggregates an immense amount. I will say for the people of those States that they are willing and anxious to pay their indebtedness according to the law of the contract, but they do protest against a policy which, if adopted, will contract the currency, increase the purchasing value of money, and compel them to expend 15 to 25 per. cent. more labor than they otherwise would to pay their indebtedness, which they believe will take place if we are forced to the single standard of gold.

I say that it is fully as reasonable a line of policy for the debtor class to oppose suspension as it is for the New York Board of Trade and Transportation to send out its confidential circulars prior to the formation of the Coinage Committee asking that personal letters be written to the Speaker of this House urging him to refrain from placing silver men on said committee, and asking co-operation in influencing public sentiment in favor of early suspension, as referred to and fully set forth in the speech of Mr. LANHAM, of Texas; or for the great savings-banks of New York to send out their circulars to members of this body favoring suspension—all done in the interest of the creditor class. But I believe that it should be the real aim of law-makers to legislate for the whole people and not for any special class. I had supposed that, if you are obliged to make a distinction, it was the duty of the legislative power to legislate for the greatest number. On this theory the debtor class would first receive our attention.

There is no doubt but that the great agriculture class, that great conservative force upon which, in my judgment, the perpetuity of this nation largely depends, want a stable and fixed currency. It is to their interest that values should not be shifting. They are, however, becoming somewhat restless. They think their interests receive but little attention, and certainly they do not receive the attention they deserve. While their interests are the largest in the country and make up the great wealth of the Republic, yet the Agricultural Department is a mere bureau. The bureau of animal industry occupies rooms divided off by boards in the roof story of the agricultural building. The dreaded disease of pleuro-pneumonia is in four hundred and fifty-five herds in this country, yet Congress is tardy in taking hold of the question with a strong arm and wiping it out.

The great butter and cheese interest is being endangered by a fraud, and no remedy is provided. Special interests seem to have able defenders on this floor, but there is a wonderful apathy for the agriculturist. We find the great protective interests keep able representatives in this body, who have grown gray and venerable in the service, and who at all times use their ability and experience in keeping the tariff up to the old standard. The money interests and the banks have able defenders in Congress. The laboring men are uniting and seeing that they are specially represented, and they are demanding legislation to protect themselves from the power of monopolies and combined capital.

But here is the agriculturist, who works for the next eight months on an average of fourteen hours each day, not only himself but his wife and children, with but little society but the books and papers which he so largely takes and reads; who is looking after his interest? He has in all probability a mortgage of from $1,000 to $2,000 on his farm; every effort is being made to pay it and provide a home for his old age, but he sees all other interests specially protected but his own. He sees the nations of the world adopting a policy to increase the value of money, and also a disposition in this country on the part of the creditor-class to follow their example; and is it any wonder that there is a restless and alarmed condition even among this conservative element.

Let us look at this question for a moment in a practical way, and see if there is any necessity for us to follow in the footsteps of England and other nations. Gold and silver are the money of the world. Both metals are used in about the same proportion, although there is more silver than gold. Does any sane man believe that there will be a permanent demonetization of silver throughout the world, or even in any considerable portion of it? Self-interest on the part of the nations will oppose any permanent demonetization, and the present condition is only temporary and in the interest of creditors, which is bound to be corrected as soon as public attention is generally and fully directed to the great question. As long as the two metals are used as money its value and the ratio between them should be fixed by international arrangement or by concurrent legislation. There can be no such thing as permanent stability in values in any other policy.

Suppose for instance that the leading nations fix their own ratio—one at 1:15½, another 1:16, another 1:20, and so on, then there must be, so long as commerce exists, so long as silver and gold have a commercial value, no such thing as permanence in values, because the effect of such divergent ratios would surely end in some countries having all the silver and others all the gold, and prices would shift and change accordingly. If each nation is to fix its own ratio, we in one sense do away with the currency of the world, and we might about as well fix as a basis a bushel of wheat or a steer of given weight and age.

There is only one solution of this question upon a proper basis, and that is, so long as we use gold and silver throughout the world that we have a common ratio. Our fathers built on a solid foundation when they established that the legal-tender coins of the United States be made of both metals, and this policy continued until 1873. It might be well to refer to the views of some of the statesmen of modern times. Mr. Blaine, in a speech delivered in the Forty-fifth Congress, said:

I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in the end throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value, and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property. If, as the most reliable statistics affirm, there are nearly seven thousand millions of coin or bullion in the world, not very unequally divided between gold and silver, it is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results which will prove distressing to millions and utterly disastrous to tens of thousands.

Ex-Senator Thurman, of Ohio, in 1881, in his speech at the monetary conference, used these words:

I believe that bimetallism will ultimately prevail; for I can not see how the vast structure of credit, the most distinguishing feature of modern industry and commerce, can be supported on a gold basis alone. With both metals, its base has often been found too narrow; but with one it would be, to my apprehension, positively unsafe.

WILLIAM M. EVARTS, at the same conference, said:

As there never had been a time in history when silver and gold had not been necessary and been used as money, or when their united strength was more than adequate for the unfolding progress of society, so above all things in this age and in the actual circumstances of the world was this true.

There is only one permanent solution of this question, and that is, so long as gold and silver are used throughout the world we have a mutual understanding as to ratio. All the signs indicate to me that we are to have it, and for one I am in no haste to take action in this House at this session. We want the people to understand that we will look out for their interests. We are doing this under the present law. Under the Bland law forty-eight millions can be coined each year. The total output of silver last year in this country was only about forty-eight millions, and it is estimated that we used nearly nine millions in the arts. It therefore follows that if the administration looks out for the interest of our silver producers the entire product would be coined and several millions besides.

The fact is that the course of the present administration has had much to do with the decline in silver bullion during the past year. This is shown by extracts from foreign papers which I have taken from the speech of a prominent ex-Senator made a few weeks ago, who is very careful in the making of statements. He alleges that in the beginning of 1885 the London price of silver per ounce was 50 pence, and it fell to 47½ pence on the publication in the London Times of the following dispatch received from the United States, under date of September 16:

A Cabinet council was held yesterday to consider the silver question. Both the President and Secretary of the Treasury will recommend Congress to stop the coinage of silver dollars.

The London Economist of September 12, in referring to the decline in silver, stated:

In the main, it is only the old cause—apprehension as to the future of silver—which has been inoperative for years, but which has recently been revived and intensified by the agitation in the United States against the continuous coinage of silver.

The London and China Telegraph of September 26, in commenting on the semi-panic, said:

At a Cabinet council held in Washington, on the 15th instant, it was resolved to recommend Congress to stop coining silver under the Bland bill, and the semi-panic on Thursday, September 17, was a not unnatural consequence.

The London Banker's Magazine said:

The agitation of the repeal of the Bland act is a main cause of the depreciation. The amount of silver coinage in the States is £5,000,000 annually, and were Congress to sanction an abrogation of the law that enforces the absorption of that amount by the Treasury a complete glut would doubtless be seen in the market.

The Manchester Guardian of the 16th of October says:

The recent heavy fall in the silver market and the Eastern exchanges has been caused mainly by an apprehension of the repeal of the American silver coinage act of 1878.

Now let Congress give the world to understand that there is to be no suspension of silver coinage, and there is no doubt but that there will be a decided appreciation in the value of silver bullion.

Bimetallism is becoming the subject of consideration all over the civilized world. The question is booming up like a great cloud all over Europe, and the contest is approaching. Germany is arguing the question in the Reichstag. Hundreds of agricultural societies have sent petitions to Prince von Bismarck "declaring that the farming interest demands the re-establishment of the bimetallic plan and that the monometallic plan is in the interest of money-lenders and capitalists alone." France, as well as all the states of the Latin Union, are now ready to meet us, and even England can not "down" the question. Mr. H. R. Grenfell, ex-governor of the Bank of England, in an address at Manchester upon bimetallism, February 16, 1886, closed by saying:

Now, what do we want you to do? It is to give us your support in endeavoring to press on the Government the advisability of doing that which all other governments have done, namely, of studying it, as the Germans have, of coming to a conclusion on it, as the Americans have, or of appointing a permanent special commission to watch it, as the French have, and to negotiate with these governments, if they are willing, through our diplomatic agents. We believe that the other nations are perfectly willing to enter into treaties, not only if we bind ourselves, but even if we are ready to take minor measures short of an immediate and absolute adhesion.

The following dispatch to the Chicago Tribune shows the effect of the demonetization of silver on the imperial interests of England:

[Via Mackay-Bennett cable to the Tribune.]

LONDON, March 29, 1882.

The strong report of Sir Auckland Colvin, the financial member of the council of the governor of India, on the condition of the Indian finances confirms all my intimations concerning the effect of the demonetization of silver upon the imperial interests of England. The subject is certain to compel the early and intelligent attention of the government, the only alternative to its neglect being bankruptcy in India and the ruin of the export trade of Manchester. At the personal request of Lord Iddesleigh, Sir William Harcourt, chancellor of the exchequer, consented to refer the silver question to the commission inquiring into the causes of the depression of trades. Mr. Morton Frewen proposes a loan of £50,000,000 to India, which shall be converted into silver. The Bank of England is also considering the question of its authority to issue notes against silver without a special act of Parliament.

I believe the time is near at hand when the question will be settled. At present we are doing very well. We issue a better silver dollar than any leading nation in Europe. We are in a position to have something to say upon the question, situated as we are between the great nations of the East and West. Let us look out for our own interest. For my part, I should prefer that the present law (Bland act) should continue on the statute-books until another session. Let us return to the people and discuss it. Good will come from the consideration. In the mean time the agitation will go on in Europe, and by another winter, or, at farthest, another Congress, the question can be intelligently considered in all its phases. On the other hand, if it is insisted that now is the accepted time, if the question is forced to an issue as presented by the President, his Secretary, and the capitalist of the East, then I say, as between suspension and free coinage of silver, I shall vote for free coinage.

Suppose we suspend, then what? You say we will in that event be able to treat with other nations on this question, while now they refuse. Do you seriously believe that the coining of two million per month is a material element in influencing other nations permanently to refuse to remonetize silver? Certainly not. If you suspend you are only assisting the money-loaning nations to reap a rich return that always follows a commotion in monetary affairs, and also give them a fresh reason through our example for insisting on the single standard of gold. No; let us give the nations of the world to understand that this young but rich Republic, rich in its resources, its agricultural lands, its mines of coal, lead, petroleum, iron, gold, and silver, will not be dictated to upon this question; that while we are ready to treat as to the ratio, yet silver and gold shall continue, as it ever has, to be the money of the world.

There is another consideration why we should have an international standard, and that is we shall probably make money by it. The ratio between gold and silver in Europe is 1:15½, in the United States 1:16. It is not to be supposed that Europe with its one thousand millions of silver will come to our standard of 1:16. The loss would be too great. It would be far better for us to adopt their standard of 1:15½, in which event we would make about 3 per cent., which is no small item. We would probably make on the amount of our present silver coin between six and seven million dollars.

It is a favorite idea with many that this great country, situated far from the money powers of Europe and rich within itself, can determine its own monetary affairs. I admit we could do this if we lived within ourselves. If we had a Chinese wall built around us and had no intercourse with other nations we might act entirely without reference to the balance of the world. But so long as we use the world's metals as money, so long as there is commerce, and we look to other nations for traffic and markets, we should, necessarily, in the very nature of things have some understanding with the world in reference to the great standards of value and exchange; and while I say we should have an international standard and should endeavor to come to some understanding with other nations, yet I would not follow the dictates of the money powers across the water. The time has come for this nation to assert its dignity and power among he nations of Europe.

I view the situation in monetary affairs with alarm, and it will take wise statesmanship to avoid the rocks and breakers before us. The nations are becoming restless. The great gigantic railroad enterprises of the world are fast bringing the nations together to one common market. Distance and time are almost lost sight of. The dynasties of Europe, which are depending on the accumulated wealth of centuries for their continuation, are in fact tottering, and their life is short; but they are endeavoring still to maintain their power and wealth by a discriminating policy in reference to the world's metals. The time has come for this young, vigorous, gigantic nation, wonderful in its possibilities, to assert its own proper influence with firmness and moderation. The contest between silver and gold is going on in Europe with every indication that bimetallism will succeed.

The United States stands to-day upon good ground. We called a halt in 1878 toward the tendency to further demonetize silver when we remonetized the metal. We are using both metals and keeping them equal with no immediate cause for alarm. In other words, we are doing well. We are in a position to treat with other nations on fair terms. Let the contest go on in other lands. We know, from the very nature of things, that bimetallism will be the final result and that both metals will be put on a parity. This is no time for us to experiment with extreme measures. Let us take such a course that our people will have confidence that the metals selected by our fathers shall continue to be used as they intended, and that no distinction shall be made between them to the injury of any class. We must have confidence among the people if we desire prosperity. I fear, taking the conditions as they are, that if this Congress should suspend the coinage of silver there would be such a political revolution in this country as was never witnessed. It would be taken by the large producing class as an indication that the legislative power of the Government was looking alone to the interests of the creditors.

Mr. Speaker, I have given this complicated question the best attention and consideration that I could with the manifold duties pressing upon us here, and I have come to the determination, until the conditions change, to let well enough alone, and shall vote accordingly. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. FULLER. I desire to reserve that, having promised to yield it to another gentleman.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, the subject-matter of this debate has probably received more attention, been the subject of more discussion, and the occasion of more books, pamphlets, and documents than any question which has excited public interest for the past twenty-five years.

Indeed, the question of the single or double monetary standard has been one of the foremost in all civilized nations for the past century.

Because of the conceded fact that in every nation its monetary system is of fundamental importance, the best minds of the world have discussed the question in all its bearings, and it may be safely assumed that the desirability and utility of using both gold and silver as money has been decided in the affirmative by the general judgment, as well as the practice, of most nations for centuries; indeed, since the dawn of civilization.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to go into any of the arguments by which this practically universal custom is sustained.

I take it that in a general way every one who does me the honor to listen to me to-day is familiar with these oft-repeated reasons for the use of gold and silver as money metals.

This nation has always been bimetallic.

A brief résumé of our coinage system may not be out of place; omitting references to subsidiary coins, alloys, and trade-dollars, simply dealing with the history of the monetary unit, and the amount of pure metal in the dollar coins.

By this table it will be seen that the silver dollar has never been changed since the formation of the Government; it has always contained the same amount of pure metal that it now has; and as to its relative value to gold from 1760 to 1874, silver was always undervalued; that is to say, an ounce of gold would not buy 15.98 ounces of silver, the rates fixed by law.

It will be seen, too, that the difference in the bullion values of the two metals was a matter of consideration by the Congress, and attempts were made in two instances to equalize their value by changing the amount of pure metal in one of the coins. This was regarded as a perfectly legitimate exercise of legislative power, and the policy was, as the gold dollar was too valuable as compared with silver, to equalize the coins by taking a few grains out of the gold dollar.

So, by the act of June 28, 1834, the number of grains in the gold dollar was decreased from 24.75 grains to 23.2 grains. Silver was the standard, and to make an equality between the bullion and monetary value, the gold was reduced.

It should be remembered also that up to the act of March 3, 1849, 9 Statutes, page 397, no such coin as a gold dollar was known.

This act provided for the gold dollar, declared it to be of the value of a dollar; the only dollar that had up to this date been created and coined was the standard silver dollar. The law did not make a gold dollar, but authorized the issuance of a gold piece of the value of a dollar.

The language of the law is:

> That there shall be, from time to time, struck and coined, &c., * * * and gold dollars, each to be of the value of one dollar or unit; * * * and the gold dollar shall be a legal tender for one dollar.

The dollar was the money of account and the unit of value by which the gold was valued.

This being true, and both metals having been used as money metals during all these years, and as the silver dollar was originally the standard and was never dethroned except by the accidental omission of it by name in the revision of the laws as reported to the Forty-third Congress, the natural inquiry is, what conditions exist; what circumstances have arisen which make it either undesirable or improper to continue the recognition and use of both metals as heretofore?

For myself, I want a currency which shall be used alike for the laborer and the capitalist; for the man who fulfills the curse pronounced on the race by earning his bread by the sweat of his brow; for the farmer and the fundholder; for he who digs and delves, as for he who depends on a fixed income. One currency for all, which shall not be, by reason of its diminishing or diminished volume under the control of those whose interest will lie in increasing its purchasing power to their advantage and reciprocally to the disadvantage of the remainder of the people, because the universal experience of the world has ever been that the debtors—always in the majority, the laborer constituting nine-tenths of the population—are always the first to feel the weight of the newly imposed burden, and the last to adapt themselves to the changed condition.

And therefore I am for the double standard for both metals as money, and as a matter not only of justice to the people, as well as for the increasing of their prosperity. I am in favor of not only continuing the present recognition of both metals in our monetary affairs, but of enlarging the use of silver, and extending its usefulness by increasing the opportunities for issuing and using its paper representative, and by making it a legal tender to the fullest extent.

I do not assume that in a field of discussion which has been so thoroughly cultivated, harvested, and gleaned as that of the currency, that I can add anything of special value in the matter of argument in this debate, but I add my voice here to the discussion because of the necessity of showing in the records of legislative procedure what I believe to be the sentiments of nineteen-twentieths of the people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor.

I believe the opinions which I entertain and express are those not only of my people but of a like proportion of the people of the great West and South.

Those who oppose the further coinage of silver, and who are able to control a large proportion of the metropolitan newspaper press of the East, are badly mistaken in their assumption that the people are with them; and equally erroneous is the view that the reports from official sources that all efforts to circulate silver have been abortive are an indication, if not proof, of that condition of public sentiment, as I shall hope to show.

This debate will have a healthy influence. It is asserted that one cause of the present depressed condition of business affairs in the country is the feeling of uncertainty as to the future condition of the monetary laws of the nation. The agitation, discussion, and expression of public sentiment by those only authorized to express it will, when the conclusion shall be reached, leave no doubt unsolved as to what the people mean and will have.

If the Representatives understand their constituents the debate has proceeded far enough in both Houses to demonstrate that if there ever was any room for doubt as to the wishes or intentions of the people, that doubt is now resolved to an absolute certainty that the people demand the retention and use of the old standard dollar. I have yet to notice a State west of New York or south of Pennsylvania where the delegation is not committed in opposition to any proposed restriction. And, indeed, if the practice of the British Parliament obtained here of passing a vote of confidence, or the want of it, on the policy of this administration as to silver, it is absolutely safe to say its lease of power would be limited to the length of time required to call the roll and adjourn.

I have said that I did not expect to add much of value to this discussion in the way of argument on the general question of finance.

I should feel a diffidence in expressing conclusions so widely different from those entertained, and honestly so, I doubt not, by so many gentlemen eminent as financiers and students of such subjects generally, were it not for the fact that in reading the debates in Congress when this subject was the leading one, in 1876, 1877, and 1878, I find that the judgments of so many gentlemen, who were so eminent that their utterances were regarded as oracular, were so singularly in error; that these predictions are worthy of reproach.

A distinguished gentleman (Mr. Leonard) from Louisiana said, in speaking of the act of 1878:

> The measure is fraught with evil and will only aggravate the present distressed condition of the country.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] said in the debate on the veto message of President Hayes:

> I desire to re-enforce it [the message] by showing that this bill, if it should become a law, will work sure and certain ruin within twelve months to the business of the country, now struggling for existence. In the one minute which was allowed me on the passage of this bill I predicted that its repeal would be demanded within a year by the indignant voice of a deceived and outraged people.

And so the cry and direful prediction of immediate and impending calamity went on. The number of these alarmists was large, and their positions prominent, and therefore entitled their judgment to corresponding confidence.

But these predictions happily were never verified. The public sentiment then, the state of public opinion coming up from the great mass of the common people, was so strong that no power in Congress or out of it could stem the tide of popular feeling in favor of silver; and the bill, over the veto of the President, became a law.

Senator SHERMAN as Secretary of the Treasury gave an official opinion that we could not carry to exceed $50,000,000 in silver, and he said to Congress in a report of December 2, 1878:

> The Secretary respectfully recommends that he be authorized to discontinue the coinage of the silver dollar when the amount outstanding shall exceed $50,000,000.

Does anybody believe that, had the recommendations of the Secretary been adopted, any more than the $50,000,000 would have been coined?

We have now over two hundred and fifteen millions of silver coined and maintained at par with gold to-day, an excess of one hundred and sixty-five millions above what the Secretary thought we could carry. Who among the financiers of to-day will hazard the statement that this $165,000,000 difference, which would never have been coined if it could have been prevented by the Treasury officials, could be withdrawn from the currency of the nation with any degree of safety?

All these melancholy predictions have failed to impress the people, and especially as not one of the evils predicted has befallen the nation. The alarms so frequently sounded and as frequently failing have ceased to cause anxiety, and they breed distrust of the ability and judgment of the eminent gentlemen who utter them.

Not only were the predictions of these alarmists not verified, but now, seven years having elapsed and the coinage act having added at least $215,000,000 to the circulating medium of the country, all passes at par.

As to this, let it be remembered, the President says in his message:

> There is certainly not enough silver now in circulation to cause uneasiness, and the whole amount coined and on hand might after a time be absorbed by the people without apprehension.

This admission (of what everybody knows) settles the question that it is not existing, present troubles which are complained of, because up to this date it is conceded that the coinage act has fulfilled the expectation of its supporters so far as it has been executed by the Treasury officials.

But now, as in the past, it is disasters in the future and close at hand to overtake us against which we are warned; and it is the same set of men with the same interests at heart, if not at stake, who are now attempting to work a suspension of the coinage of silver.

I ask why should we repose more confidence in their judgment now than eight years ago? Every prediction they then made has failed; for every evil they predicted a blessing has come to this people, and every cloud they descried has had literally a silver lining, giving light and joy instead of shadow and sorrow.

Happily for this people these prophets of evil have proved to be false prophets, absolutely unreliable; and our experience under the coinage act is of far more weight than all the theories and speculations of professional financiers, speculators, and doctrinaires.

Now, Mr. Speaker, because of these unanimous failures in judgment on the part of the great financiers and men of business affairs, and because the great results so happily attained were wrought by men not assuming to possess special inspirations on the question, but who thought an honest, common-sense view of matters the best, I venture to suggest some thoughts which have occurred to me as to our present position and the proper course to be pursued with reference to it.

I take it, sir, that suspension of the coinage—the mildest interference proposed by the opposition—is equivalent to a partial demonetization.

It is conceded by all, so far as I know, that the immediate effect of suspension of silver coinage would be the reduction, to some extent, in its bullion value. All agree, I think, that restraining or restricting the use of silver would work a depreciation in its market value; and correspondingly, the demonetization of silver, wholly or partially, would, to a greater or less degree, appreciate the value of gold.

On the first question, I remember when a member of the Committee on Coinage in the Forty-seventh Congress and the question of suspending the coinage of silver dollars was being considered in committee, we called before us Mr. Burchard, then Director of the Mint, and he gave us as his opinion that—

> The suspension of the coinage of the twenty-seven million of silver bullion now annually retained in the coinage—this bullion thrown upon the market—will at once depress the price to at least three-fourths, perhaps less, its present value. One of the largest bullion dealers in the country lately wrote me that the suspension of silver coinage would probably depress the price of silver bullion to 35*d*.

This, in other words, means a clear depreciation of 25 per cent. in the bullion value of the silver we have, as well as that we hereafter acquire by mining or purchase, as well as an increase in the value, or rather the purchasing power, of the gold used as money metal. This is to be kept in mind as well that an increase in the purchasing power of money is always a gratuity, a clear gift to the creditor classes, and, conversely, an "imposition of a like additional burden on the debtors."

As truly and tersely said by Senator JONES, of Nevada, in 1878:

> Any effort, therefore, to deprive gold and silver, or any portion of either, of the debt-paying function, without furnishing something to take its place, is treason to the human race. Measured against that treason the disappointment of what are called—whether in grim joke or not I am unable to say—"the honest expectation of creditors, public or private, sinks into utter nothingness."

Demonetization, whether full or partial, means a decrease in the material in which debts may be paid, and an increase in the purchasing power of whatever money metal is left. It then takes more of labor, or the products of labor, or property to secure the same amount of legal tender than before. Whatever is paid thereafter by those who have to produce to procure must be by the expenditure of more productive force than before; the capacity to acquire by the laborer or producer is reduced to the extent of the demonetization.

But let this be kept in mind—there is no corresponding, indeed, no reduction in any debt, national, State, municipal, corporation, or individual, the weight of which always rests upon the back of labor.

Appropriating an idea from the Senator from Kansas, Mr. INGALLS, that with the destruction of the money power of silver, the value of property of every description diminishes in proportion. Wages fall, and employment ceases. The value of everything is depreciated except debts and gold. The mortgage, the bond, the coupon, the tax retain immortal youth and vigor, they do not depreciate; the debt remains but the capacity to pay has been destroyed.

There are no reasons for believing that there is any too much gold and silver in the world, or that there will ever be, to supply the needs of commerce, to act as the basis of security for paper issues, and the needs of manufacture into articles of utility and beauty.

The statistics of production and absorption demonstrate that the increased necessities of trade and business consequent upon the natural increase of population will not be supplied by the annual production, from present indications. Year by year a decreased production of both metals is apparent.

In view of this, conceded to be true, we are asked, as a matter of deliberate action, to make this terrible sacrifice, to cause this vast depreciation of values, and add these impositions on labor, for what end? That the doctrinaire's theory may be tested—that such action will occasion so much distress in Europe that England and Germany will gladly hasten to join in an international agreement for coinage on a common ratio.

For myself, this to me is a purely a question of secondary importance. I prefer to legislate for America first; to treat this as an American question, and as to its immediate effect upon our own people. Why need we go performing around and begging some European monarchy to join us in any such scheme?

Congress is bound to look after the interest of this people primarily, and in doing so a close examination of the wants, interests, and rights of the debtor class may not be out of place.

Sir, the sole object of the anti-silver men seems to be to protect the interests of the creditor classes, and to enact such measures as shall not only guarantee to them all possible benefits growing out of changed conditions arising from natural causes, pending the debt, but secure to them beyond peradventure any possible injury by reason of future changes.

This proposal to extend the coinage of silver is confessedly in the interest immediately of the creditor classes. It has somewhat of a sectional character in this, that the proposition to suspend finds its main support in the delegates here from the East; its opposers, outside of the larger cities where capital is aggregated, in a practically solid body of the Representatives from the South and West. Nor is the reason for this difficult to be found. In the Union, the accumulations of available wealth—money and savings—are in the old-settled East; it is practically improved to its capacity and rich in money, savings, and accumulations, and is a lender and creditor.

The West on account of its comparative youth, and the South by the disasters and ruin caused by the civil war, are poor in cash, engaged in tremendous works of improvement and progress, opening and improvements of farms, the building of towns and cities for the trade of the rapidly increasing population, railroad enterprises which by their magnitude and requirement of investment stagger the belief of the investigator—all largely built on credit, the proceeds of a bonded indebtedness that the tributary country must assume and pay; all these make the great West and South now large borrowers and debtors.

As well, except such as are held by the national banks as a basis of security for issues of their notes, the domestic holdings of the bonds of the nation are largely East. The proportion of the population who are laborers and producers, as to those who are capitalists, fundholders, those living on fixed incomes and speculators by the use of cash, is estimated at nine-tenths.

Motives of self-interest, therefore, naturally prompt the creditor classes and those representing them to insist upon such legislation as shall meet their views of justice, and in case such legislation shall in any degree tend to increase the burden upon the debtors, a contest arises; such an one, and between these two classes, is presented by the bill proposing suspension of silver coinage.

I think it is susceptible of proof that the eastern part of the Union, where it is sometimes assumed that the people have a kind of monopoly of general intelligence, embracing especially questions of finance and political economy, has had as well a monopoly of legislation in its interest.

There is no doubt that the general course of legislation for the past twenty years in financial matters as to the holders of Government bonds has been in the interest of the creditor class.

The bonds the Government originally issued were payable in lawful money. The legal-tender note of the Government was and is lawful money. The law under which they were issued caused this to be impressed on the back of each:

This note is a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

Generally the bonds were purchased and paid for in these notes; but as time rolled on and the question was raised as to the power of Congress to make paper a legal tender, and the credit of the Government was failing under these assaults, Congress was besieged by the creditors, until on March 18, 1869, the act "to strengthen the public credit" was passed. That act is in these words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

By this act the Government pledged itself to make payment to its creditors in coin—that is, gold and silver; what was before payable in legal-tender notes, then largely at a discount, became payable only in coin. The creditors of the nation, holding the bonds payable in lawful money—greenbacks—clamored for coin, the more valuable currency, and secured the legislation.

The next important step was the act of 1873, demonetizing silver.

So soon as the people were advised of the effect of the act of 1873, a tide of public sentiment swept into these Halls, irresistible; and the act of 1878 resulted—a partial concession only to the public demand, but containing the vital proposal to re-establish the standard silver dollar as a full legal tender.

The act passed notwithstanding the violent opposition of the banks, bondholders, capitalists, and the great crowd of alarmists, and under the inmost direful predictions of disaster and ruin, sure to follow, and over the veto of the President.

Pending this, the bondholders asserted that by the act of 1873 demonetizing silver their bonds were payable in gold, notwithstanding every bond then outstanding was issued under the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt."

That act authorized the issuance of these bonds "redeemable in coin of the present standard value," &c., and also provided that "the said bonds shall have set forth and expressed upon their face the above specified conditions."

In pursuance of this law, every bond now outstanding contains upon it the recital that it is issued in accordance with the provisions of the act of July 14, 1870, &c., and redeemable "in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof," &c.

But to save any possible question of construction and to remove all doubts as to the meaning of the movement then in progress, and at the same session, Hon. Stanley Matthews, of Ohio, introduced in the Senate this joint resolution, as a definitive explanation and construction of the laws in force as to the payment of the public debt:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued, or authorized to be issued, under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars, of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith, nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

This resolution passed both Houses by overwhelming majorities, clearly showing the sentiment of the people on the question, and this was emphasized by the prompt overruling of the veto of the President. As was said by one of the leading papers:

In the whole history of the Government there was never before a veto of any bill by any President which was overruled with such swift promptitude or by majorities in both Houses so superfluously large.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the same questions are again presented, under new guises, and we are asked to suspend the coinage of silver for reasons of both justice and policy. It is conceded that the aim of the anti-silver men is to bring the nation to a gold basis; to fix a gold standard. There is no attempt at concealment of the object, to compel payment of obligations, of the vast mountain of debt in gold, the most valuable metal. Suspension is the first step. Taking this would then be urged as a formal acknowledgment of the principle, and then the argument of "plighted faith," "national honor," and other high-sounding phrases always invoked in aid of the creditors—and never yet applied in the interest of debtors—would be fervently, and doubtless effectually, urged against the retracing of the step.

Neither justice nor policy demands the change. Since the great bulk of our debt was created, from natural causes easily appreciated, generally and thoroughly understood and conceded by the friends of a gold standard, a great change has occurred in the relative value or purchasing power of gold and silver; and beyond, outside of this, this relative difference has been largely increased by artificial means, such as the demonetization of silver by Germany and other nations in Europe, and the continued, persistent, and violent attacks upon it in our own country by the creditor classes and the executive officers of the Government for the past ten years.

I deny that it is unjust to pay in silver, because the contract expressly provides that the people shall have that option. It is a new and startling doctrine that in all cases the debtor must not only agree to perform, but must guarantee the value of the currency in which he has the legal right to pay. Clearly, the Government has the right under the Constitution to "coin money and regulate the value thereof." It may change the standard when it chooses. The act of 1870 protected the creditor as against a future change of standard to his detriment by providing that the bonds should be paid in coin of the then standard. The holders were not to be prejudiced by a reduction in the standard by the Government. The holders have the legal right to coins of that standard, and equally clear is the right of the Government to pay in the same.

The suggestion that national honor demands payment in gold is equally as absurd. It is purely fanciful, and only rises in the fancy of those who are to be benefited. Who talks about the dishonor of payment in silver except the representatives of the creditor class? Are we asked seriously to make payment in the dearer metal as a matter of honor that we may merit the applause of our creditors? This is its only compensation. The honor of a nation, like that of an individual, is always kept and sustained by a prompt and faithful performance of its undertakings as it agrees. An option to do in one of two ways is legally honorably satisfied by performance in either, and it is a form of lunacy to argue that honor demands the performance of the act most injurious to the debtor.

We are asked to pay these debts in a currency which the creditor largely controls, and abandon the right to pay them in what the debtor has in reasonable abundance. Such a rule not only never obtained, but was never urged as to an individual. The course proposed to be pursued by the silver men is that which has always prevailed.

After the discoveries of gold in California and Australia, and in consequence of the large increase in its production, it became relatively the cheaper metal. We paid in gold, and as a rule gold alone, simply because gold was the cheaper metal, and was less burdensome to the tax-payer, and was the dollar of the contract. Nobody questioned the right then.

The honest dollar is the dollar made so by law and contracted to be paid. Less than this would be dishonorable to the creditor; more than this, dishonest to the debtor.

The argument of equity is based on the assertion that silver has largely depreciated in purchasing power. Tested by gold alone, I admit this; but in comparison with other commodities of commerce and use silver has not depreciated. That is to say, an ounce of silver bullion to-day will secure more of the necessaries, comforts, and luxuries of life than it would twelve or fifteen years ago.

The general course of prices has for these years been downward; and to determine whether the apparent relative difference between gold and silver has been caused by a depreciation of silver or an increase in the value of gold, statisticians have made careful compilations of facts bearing thereon.

Mr. Burchard, the late Director of the Mint, prosecuted these researches for many years, and embodied the results in his annual report. In that for 1879, page 37, he gives a table of results. He shows that the average prices of staple commodities for the closing year of each decade, 1829–'30, 1839–'40, 1849–'50, 1859–'60, 1869–'70, were substantially the same, and beginning with that year, 1870, deduces the following:

	Prices of commodities in—		Purchasing value (measured by commodities) of—
	Gold.	Silver.	Gold.	Silver.
1870	100.	100.	100.	100.
1871	102.2	101.1	97.9	98.9
1872	104.8	105.	95.4	95.3
1873	106.4	107.7	94.	92.9
1874	104.6	107.7	95.6	92.9
1875	98.3	103.3	101.8	96.8
1876	96.3	106.1	103.8	94.2
1877	95.9	107.6	104.3	93.
1878	91.6	103.2	109.2	96.9
1879	86.7	103.	115.3	97.1

Mr. Burchard followed the investigation in later years; and, to save burdening the RECORD with lengthy tables, I quote what has been so well said on this point by Senator COKE, of Texas:

I have before me a table too long to consume time in reading, prepared by the late Director of the Mint, Hon. H. C. Burchard, containing a list of ninety commodities, exported from the United States with their declared values at the time of export, for the years 1870, 1883, and 1884. These commodities comprise agricultural, manufactured, and mining products, and were selected with a view to making a just average of the prices of all sorts of products and merchandise for the years named, and it is shown conclusively by this table that the prices in 1870 were 26 per cent. higher than they were in 1884, or in other words that in the general range of prices of all commodities there was an average fall of 26 per cent. between 1870 and 1884. I have before me a similar table indicating general prices of commodities in England, which shows between 1873 and 1885 an average decline of 28 per cent.

I have before me still another table of twelve leading staple commodities, among them flour, cotton, and wool, which show an average decline in England of 36 per cent. between 1873 and 1885. In 1873 the silver bullion in a dollar was worth 103 cents in gold. It is now worth 80 cents in gold, a fall of 23 per cent. It is an abuse of terms to say in the light of these undisputed facts, when silver bullion has been less affected by this general decline than any other known commodity and can be exchanged now for more of anything of value in the world except gold than it could be in 1873, when it outvalued gold, has depreciated. I can take the 80 cents in gold, for which the bullion in the silver dollar will sell in the market, and buy with it more of anything that any man has for sale than it would have bought in 1873, when it would have sold in the market for 103 cents in gold; and the tables I have referred to prove it incontestably. Every farmer who raises wheat, or cotton, or wool, or beef, or pork knows this to his sorrow, and needs no testimony other than his own experience.

No, Mr. President, silver has not depreciated, but gold has risen in value, and a gold dollar will buy to-day an average of from 25 to 30 per cent. more of the products of the farm, of wheat, of cotton, of wool, of pork, and of beef than it would in 1873; and, more than that, it will buy that much more of the sweat and toil and life of the wage laborer, because when the product declines in value wages must also come down. Silver has remained with the farmer, the laborer, the miner, with the producer in every branch of industry, and follows and abides in value with the products of labor, falling as they fall and rising as they rise, while gold has left all, and mounted to an altitude of its own, depressing all the products of labor in value, exactly in proportion to the height of its rise. If silver bullion was alone in its decline this would be depreciation, but when it bears the same relation to all other commodities it has always borne, the margin between it and gold can only be referred to the rise in value of gold.

The same conclusions have been reached by statisticians in other countries, and therefore the expression should be a 120-cent dollar when applied to gold, if the language of the trade is to be used.

The benefits which were expected to flow from the passage of the act of 1878 have not been fully realized. That law was enacted in spite of the veto of President Hayes, and with an administration in power in open hostility to it. The officials who were intrusted with its execution continued to express sentiments of opposition to it and to predict absolute failure of beneficial results. From that day to this silver has not had a friend in either the White House or the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, notwithstanding the known wishes of the people continuously on the question. Since the law was passed five out of the seven annual messages from the President have insisted on the suspension of the coinage of silver; the other two are silent on the question. Every annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury since 1878 has recommended the same action to Congress. In every possible way in which executive interference and obstruction could be exercised against the coin it has been so used. Through our diplomatic service abroad, every means has been used to spread the idea that the use of silver as a legal tender would be abandoned, and the change in party administration has not bettered the case; indeed, made it worse, but the difference is only one of degree.

The hostility of this administration was manifested before the inauguration; the sentiments of the President-elect and the policy of his administration were proclaimed and given to the world in his letter to many members of this House in February, 1885. The response of the people came swiftly and unmistakably, when, without debate, the proposal to suspend coinage, attached to the sundry civil appropriation bill in the last session of the Forty-eighth Congress, was overwhelmingly defeated.

Again, the law requires the coinage of at least $2,000,000 worth of bullion each month. The report of the Director of the Mint for the past year shows that there was a shortage in June of last year of over one-half million of dollars.

Nay more, it was openly stated, and has never been denied to my knowledge, that in the early part of the year the Treasury officials held a consultation and discussed the question whether they had not the power to suspend the coinage under the act, because Congress had not made a specific appropriation for the monthly purchase of bullion. This in the face of the law which provides "there shall be coined," &c., "the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase," &c., and a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." Wise counsels prevailed, and the technical quibble raised by these officers to defeat the law was abandoned.

To cause it to appear that the law is a failure, no hesitation is manifested in making official statements which are wholly misleading.

The President assures us that "special efforts have been made by the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the amount of our silver coin in circulation," and Senator MORRILL, as a champion of the policy of the administration, says: "The Treasury officials have all been at work from early morn until the evening twilight in pushing silver at every cross-road in the country," and that "silver thus has been shipped at great cost wherever an opening has been found, and yet Treasury officials are berated as insincere because they have not bewitched the world with more love for silver dollars, although they appear to have kept the axles of the express cars hot in their transportation to every nook and corner of the continent."

Sir, no statements could be more misleading, indeed, void of truth. Who have they ever offered a silver dollar to that it has been refused? Who has declined to accept it, except, possibly, the holder of Government paper? I assert that the Treasury has never attempted to pay a dollar in silver, as a payment, except to Government employés who get their cash at the Treasury or some office connected therewith. Who has ever heard of a pensioner declining to take silver, or of a laborer, or of the army of Government employés about this city, or the country over? The last administration did not hesitate to pay us the principal part of our salaries in silver certificates. In the last Congress while in Washington I kept an account of the proportion of my salary that I was paid in silver certificates, and it was over 70 per cent. I saw the experiment tried several times on the floor of the House of sending a page to the Sergeant-at-Arms's office with a member's check, and never saw less than 50 per cent. come back in silver certificates, and yet at that very time, if the Sergeant-at-Arms had an excess of cash received from the Treasury, which he desired to return because not called for by us, these very certificates which they sent to him to disburse to us—new, never used—would be refused by the Treasury because they were not legal tender.

The trouble is they do not try to get them out of the Treasury. The common people, who would be glad to have this money, have very limited dealings with the Treasury. The cash that is held there is not used in transactions with the masses of the people; but the bondholders, the banks, the heavy contractors, and men of large affairs, are the ones who have direct dealings with the Treasury and are paid in Treasury drafts, paid in turn in greenbacks or gold or gold certificates. As well said by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES], "if one-fourth the ordinary expenses of the Government were paid in silver, there would be no surplus of that coin in the Treasury."

The Secretary need not burn many axles of express cars in transporting silver if he will only begin and continue to treat the holder of Government obligations as ordinary people were treated by the last administration. The truth is, as everybody knows, there is no lack of opportunity for the payment of silver dollars by the Treasury; to pretend otherwise is the veriest subterfuge, absolutely frivolous. The trouble is the opportunities are never embraced except in the case of employés conveniently located. When do the farmers, laborers, small traders, &c., ever deal with the Treasury? The banks do, but they are all arrayed against silver.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I do not appreciate the difference in obligation on the part of the Government between myself as a creditor and the holder of a Government paper obligation. What causes the special sanctity which seems to attach to a bond or coupon and entitles it to a special consideration and payment in what the Treasury regards as a higher class of funds than is tendered me as a laborer? Can any one assign any valid reason why there should be any discrimination by the Treasury officials in favor of any class of Government creditors? Still it goes on, and all official announcements are against silver and for the creditor.

Misrepresenting public sentiment, the Comptroller of the Currency says in his last report that "it is not believed that the people desire either the principal or interest on the bonded debt of this country to be paid in anything but gold coin or its equivalent."

Where does the gentleman find any evidence of that sentiment except in the commercial circles of localities where the preponderance is in favor of making money dearer and more valuable? Where are any petitions from the farmers, the laborers, the small traders who are in daily contact with the masses, with the producing classes of the country, who practically alone build it up and give it under wise laws whatever degree of prosperity it has? How many of these papers have found their way to the Committee on Coinage? None; for none have been signed. But the room of the Committee on Coinage is full of remonstrances from that class of people against the proposal to suspend the coinage.

This is the same gentleman who in his official report for the preceding year said of the act of 1878:

The law which stamps 412½ grains of silver and arbitrarily insists npou its circulation as a dollar, with unlimited legal-tender qualities—

The italics are his—

when its true value, as indicated by the market price of silver, is but 85.2 cents, is unworthy of this nation, &c.

This from an executive officer whose only duty as to the laws is to faithfully execute them, he sending to the representatives of the people his impudent opinion that the deliberate act of the Congress, as against the veto of the President, is unworthy of the nation!

Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
That he is grown so great?

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that the Treasury Department for many years has not only been managed to the benefit of the bondholders of the country, but has been a kindergarten for the education of gentlemen to positions in national banks.

But to show that it does circulate with all this opposition I append this table:

*After deducting silver certificates in circulation.

I have said that this administration was worse than the last. I will prove it. The last did pay part of the salaries of employés in silver certificates and silver, as I have said. But, mark you, Mr. Speaker, the pay-rolls at this end of the Capitol alone average $200,000 per month, and during this year, since the meeting of this Congress, not a dollar in silver certificates has been furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury to pay on this vast indebtedness—not a dollar; and so I am told it is with the army of employés in the city and at other points where Treasury disbursements are large. Where is there a Government employé who would refuse to accept this paper as payment? Not one can be found. And yet the Treasury officials are constantly parading the fact that the Treasury is being lumbered up with these standard dollars and the silver certificates, and the people do not want them and will not take them. I deny it. I assert that the statement is untrue; the people will take them if they are afforded an opportunity, and the Secretary need not use any special exertion; all he need do is to offer them; and it is idle to talk otherwise.

The hostility of the administration to silver is shown again in assenting to the action of the clearing-house in New York in its discrimination against silver.

The act of 1882 provides that no national banking association shall be a member of any clearing-house in which such certificates shall not be receivable in the settlement of clearing-house balances. The associated banks of New York have deliberately, persistently, and defiantly refused to carry out the provision of this law by an agreed evasion; namely, that no bank would offer, and, therefore, none could refuse the Government paper. The assistant treasurer at New York is a party to this agreement, and the practice is acquiesced in, if not openly approved, by the administration.

The reason therefor is plainly stated in the New York Times of recent date.

Meantime it has been suggested by a banker of very high standing that the banks are bound by every consideration of obligation to the community and of prudence in the care of the interests of their depositors to preserve the general currency on a gold basis, and to continue to treat, as they have hitherto treated, the silver currency "as an unavoidable infliction, to be separated in practical business from current money by marked discrimination." The method of carrying out this principle is to receive from the Government through the clearing-house the currency the Government may have to offer, but setting it apart and treating it as a special fund, "to be paid over to the banks interested in the very money received on their behalf." No silver or silver certificates need be offered by any bank in the settlement of its clearing-house balances, and none would need to be refused. Such as came from the Government would be received and used as opportunity offered. But the clearing-house settlements and the reserves of the banks would be preserved unadulterated, and the international standard would be maintained in its integrity. Silver would not be any more than it has been in New York bankable money, while it would continue in general circulation undepreciated until such time as its volume became too great for such use.

Such a policy is clearly within the law, and it is equally clearly calculated to secure the only solution of the currency problem, and to secure it with the least derangement to business. It will be objected that it is not calculated to promote the permanent incorporation of silver in our currency, and is opposed to the spirit and intent of the silver-coinage act. This is true. It is not intended to promote any such result, and it would lead to the ultimate repeal of the act. Of that there is no doubt. The act was at once a blunder and a wrong. There is not the slightest obligation upon any citizen or body of citizens to suffer injury from the operation of the law if it can be legally avoided. It certainly can be avoided by the banks. The law says silver dollars shall be a legal tender for debts; it does not say that they shall be a legal tender for loans on demand, such as bank deposits. The policy outlined for the banks looks to the repeal of the law, and that is the purpose of the administration and the hope of all conservative business men.

Comment is unnecessary.

The national banks—creatures of Congress—unite in a war upon the constitutional currency of the country, which policy, directly contrary to law, is outlined to secure a repeal of the silver law and defeat the expressed will of the people. "And this is the purpose of the administration." We shall see.

To render the silver laws unpopular, if possible, by causing a feeling of unrest, of impending danger, of pandering to the asserted idea that a financial crisis and panic are impending, the story was started last July that the gold balance in the Treasury was alarmingly low. Keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, that there was then in the Treasury $180,863,798 in gold coin and $71,271,013 in gold bullion and not a single dollar of Government obligations payable in gold liable to be presented for payment, the usual customs receipts being received daily, and no unusual demand apparent or asserted.

But the banks assembled and adopted the following:

Whereas, after careful inquiry into the current operations of the United States Treasury, it is ascertained that with the continued purchase of two million silver bullion per month the probable receipts of gold currency will be insufficient to meet the demands upon it until the meeting of Congress in December next, but that the Secretary will be compelled to make his payments in silver dollars, which will become a most disturbing element in the daily business of the country: Therefore,

Resolved, That to avert this threatened danger, and in the confident belief that Congress will take early steps to prevent the deterioration of the present commercial standard of value, the banks hereby tender to the Government, from their gold reserves, the sum of $10,000,000 in exchange for that amount in fractional silver coin, or for such other currency as the clearing-house committee may approve, the same to be apportioned among the banks in the clearing-house respectively, pro rata of their deposits and gold reserve.

Resolved, That should this amount prove insufficient, a further sum, not to exceed ten millions, be offered, and that the banks of Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and other cities be invited by the clearing-house committee to participate in carrying out the objects of these resolutions.

The Treasury officials took up the cry, the Treasurer met the banks, and the country was assured that in a spirit of patriotism the banks had come to the relief of the Treasury and advanced $6,000,000 of gold and taken silver therefor, and were industriously pushing the circulation of the silver throughout the Union, testing by practical example whether the people really desired silver.

For one, I never believed in either the danger asserted or in the sincerity of the effort to circulate silver, and, to ascertain precisely what was done, I had the following correspondence with the Treasury Department:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 20, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith, in compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 13th instant, copies of correspondence and certificate in regard to the exchange of silver for gold coin with the New York clearing-house.

Respectfully yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. L. E. PAYSON, House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF ASSISTANT TREASURER UNITED STATES,
New York, N. Y., July 28, 1885.

SIRS: I hereby certify that I have this day received from the associated banks $5,915,000 in gold, and that I have set aside the same amount, namely, $5,915,000, in subsidiary silver coin, in a vault of this office, under seal, which I agree to hold subject only to the order of the chairman of the clearing-house committee and the manager of the New York clearing-house.

THOMAS C. ACTON,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

To Mr. WILLIAM DOWD,
Chairman of the Clearing-House Committee, and Mr. WILLIAM A. CAMP, Manager.

OFFICE OF ASSISTANT TREASURER UNITED STATES,
New York, July 29, 1885.

SIR: I have to report the receipt of $5,915,000 in gold certificates from the associated banks (one of the banks to which was apportioned $85,000 declined to respond), in exchange for the same amount of subsidiary silver coin (half-dollars), which I now hold in one of the vaults, under seal, for the purpose of exchange if desired by the banks.

I have not taken up the amount in the Treasurer's general account as a receipt and disbursement, but as an exchange of one kind of money for another. Thus I have reduced the amount of subsidary silver coin to that extent, and correspondingly increased gold coin. It will appear in form 544, in the receipts in "gold certificates" and in the payments in "fractional silver coin," and in form 42, in the report of the liabilities and assets, and on none other of the accounts.

Very respectfully,

THOS. C. ACTON,
Assistant Treasurer.

C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer United States.

NEW YORK CLEARING-HOUSE, 14 PINE STREET,
New York, October 30, 1885.

DEAR SIR: You will remember that the banks of the city of New York deposited with the assistant treasurer of the United States the sum of $5,915,000 in gold, receiving in exchange a like amount in fractional silver coin. Since that time, though active efforts have been made to distribute it through the country, as our original intention was in making the deposit, we have been unable to do so by reason of the competition of the Treasury, which pays the express transportation to all interior points. This has operated as an effectual bar to any attempt on our part to effect the same purpose. We submit, therefore, that we be permitted to avail ourselves of a right which we possess by the terms of the law in regard to the redemption of the fractional coin, and that we deposit in the assistant treasury at New York the sum of, say, $4,500,000 (or $4,000,000, as you, in your judgment, may deem best), and receive in exchange therefor either silver dollars, silver certificates, or such other form of currency as you may deem advisable. In making this proposal we do not propose to waive any of our legal rights in the matter, but to carry out, as far as practicable, our original intention, which was to aid the Treasury in retaining its gold balance, in order that the business of the city of New York should be kept exclusively upon a gold basis as between the Government and the banks.

We see from the present condition of the Treasury no cause for apprehension of its not having gold enough for some time to come, and while making the above request can only reiterate our entire willingness to again come to the aid of the Government, whenever, in the opinion of the banks, the exigency requires that aid should be afforded in order to protect the banking interests of this city, and through them the financial and commercial interests of the whole country.

Awaiting your favorable reply,

I am, your obedient servant,

J. D. VERMILYE,
Chairman Clearing-House Committee.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., October 31, 1885.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th instant, submitting that the banks of the city of New York be permitted to deposit with assistant treasurer of the United States in exchange for lawful money, a large portion of the amount of fractional silver coin, which they had previously received from that officer in exchange for a like amount of gold, the banks being unable to distribute the silver through the country as originally intended by them.

In reply you are informed that no special permission of the Department is required in this case, as under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 9, 1879, the holder of any of the silver coins of the United States of smaller denomination than one dollar may, on presentation of the same in sums of twenty dollars, or any mutiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor lawful money of the United States.

Very respectfully,

C. S. FAIRCHILD,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. J. D. VERMILYE,
Chairman Clearing-House Committee, New York City.

This correspondence, as will plainly be seen, was indefinite as to what was done in detail, and so I again requested details of the transaction of the business and received the following:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 29, 1886.

SIR: Referring to previous correspondence relative to your inquiries concerning the exchange at the subtreasury at New York of silver for gold coin with certain of the New York banks, you are informed that since the return of the Treasurer of the United States to Washington, yesterday, it is ascertained from him that no correspondence except such as has been already furnished you passed between the banks and the Department in the matter, it having been arranged verbally at a conference in New York. The amount so exchanged under this arrangement was $5,915,000, for which one certificate was issued by the assistant treasurer (copy of said certificate dated July 28, 1885, previously furnished you), the fractional silver remained in the vaults of the subtreasury until it was paid out from time to time upon the order of the proper officers of the clearing-house, or redeemed according to the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 9, 1879.

Respectfully yours,

D. MANNING,
Secretary.

Hon. L. E. PAYSON,
House of Representatives.

This letter was also evasive as to how the silver had been disposed of—how paid, and to whom—although it clearly and in terms asserted that part, at least, of the silver was "paid out from time to time upon the order of the proper officers of the clearing-house;" and again I demanded information as to details of the payment of this certificate and as to the disposition of the silver as shown by the books and accounts of the Department, and this letter was the result:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 3, 1886.

SIR: I beg to return herewith letter from Hon. L. E. PAYSON, dated February 1, 1886, referred by you to this office, asking for information concerning payments on account of certificate issued by the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York on July 28, 1885.

This certificate, representing deposits of fractional silver amounting to $5,915,000, was redeemed in partial payments between November 4 and November 7 last in United States notes, in accordance with the provisions of the act of June 9, 1879, which directs the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States to exchange, for lawful money, silver coins of the United States, of smaller denominations than $1, when presented in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof.

Very respectfully,

C. N. JORDAN,
Treasurer of the United States.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the absolute insincerity of this transaction is fully apparent, and I call the attention of the House and the country to it.

The silver coin taken was "fractional silver," not a legal tender except for trivial sums, at the outset stamping the transaction as only colorable, and the coin itself never leaving the Treasury, all the time locked up—"under seal."

But the country was not alarmed; not a ripple appeared on the commercial ocean; the people remained serene; and, finally, on October 30, the banks suggested to Mr. Secretary Manning:

You will remember that the banks of the city of New York deposited with the assistant treasurer of the United States the sum of $5,915,000 in gold, receiving in exchange a like amount of fractional silver coin. Since that time, though active efforts have been made to distribute it through the country, * * * we have been unable to do so, &c.

All this time the silver was "under seal" in the Treasury.

The efforts were clearly very strenuous!

But failing in this they "submit that we be permitted to avail ourselves of a right we possess to deposit four million five hundred thousand or four million and receive in exchange therefor either silver dollars, silver certificates, or such other form of currency you (the Secretary of the Treasury) may deem advisable."

Here was an opportunity for the Secretary to do something he had desired—to pay silver to any creditor who would take it and thus relieve the vaults of standard dollars.

These self-sacrificing patriots, who had come to the rescue of the Treasury and asked for fractional silver, now desired silver dollars or silver certificates, and asked to be paid in them. But the officer of the Government who had been keeping the axles of express cars hot "in sending silver over the country from one depository to another—and never tendering a dollar to a creditor—blandly tells the banks they can have "lawful money if they desire!"

The next week the payment is so made and that farce is ended.

Why, Mr. Speaker, do all these parties in this transaction resort to such subterfuges and deceptions? Why did the Secretary write me that the silver was "paid out from time to time?" Why the banks allege their efforts to put the silver in circulation? Let the country judge, and it will!

Sir, a refusal to obey the law or an indirect nullification of its requirements by a public officer is an abandonment of the plain path of duty, and should cause the officer the loss of the confidence of the people.

The motive of self-interest on the part of the banks against silver is not difficult to find. Silver is the only money that is in circulation among the people which the banks can not control if the policy outlined by this administration shall prevail.

Let it be remembered, Mr. Speaker, what that policy is, and it can not be too prominently mentioned and discussed.

First, the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, page 16, announces that the limited coinage of silver and the act of May 31, 1878, prohibiting the retirement of the greenback, are "two evils which are each a separate menace to the public tranquillity and injurious to the public morals."

He recommends the repeal of the silver-coinage act and of the act making compulsory Treasury issues and reissues of the legal-tender notes.

The favorite plan among the people of the issue of gold and silver certificates is declared injudicious and should be abolished.

This policy then, Mr. Speaker, would leave the country with nothing but gold, its present stock of silver, and national-bank notes as its currency.

Nothing then would be more certain than that the banks would be absolute masters of the situation and control the money of the nation.

As said by Mr. Hamilton, "the general state of debtor and creditor, all the relations and consequences of price, the essential interests of trade and industry, the value of all property, the income of State and individuals will be subject to the judicious or injudicious regulation" of the currency by the national banks.

The continued coinage of silver will render this impossible.

Another evidence of not only the hostility of the administration to silver and its determination to effect a repeal of the present law is found in the deceptive methods adopted in the execution of it.

The President says in his message to us:

> Every month two millions of gold in the public Treasury are paid out for two millions or more of silver dollars, to be added to the whole mass already accumulated. * * * If continued long enough this operation will result in the substitution of silver for all the gold the Government owns applicable to its general purposes.
>
> It will not do to rely upon the customs receipts of the Government to make good this drain of gold, because the silver thus coined having been made legal-tender for all debts and dues, public and private, at times during the last six months 58 per cent. of the receipts for duties have been in silver or silver certificates, while the average in that period has been 20 per cent.

This proposition has been taken up by very many of the opponents of silver in this House and in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, and the changes rung upon it, and the foolishness of the policy of draining the Treasury of its gold to pay for silver bullion, &c.

Only the other day the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD] asserted the same line, and this colloquy ensued:

> Mr. MILLARD. But why should the people of the country be taxed at the rate of at least $2,000,000 per month for the coinage of a coin that can not be forced into circulation? Every month there is taken out of the United States Treasury $2,000,000 in gold to meet the requirements of the Bland bill, and if the advocates of that bill could have their way the sum thus taken would be four instead of two million dollars.
>
> Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. What evidence have you that $2,000,000 a month in gold was paid out of the Treasury for bullion?
>
> Mr. MILLARD. The act authorizes the payment of two millions a month as a minimum—from two millions to four millions per month.
>
> Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Does the act provide that it shall be paid in gold?
>
> Mr. MILLARD. The practice of the Government has been to pay in gold, or its equivalent.
>
> Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Oh, the practice of the Government; but what is the statute? Does that require payment in gold?
>
> Mr. MILLARD. I do not think it does.
>
> Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then why not pay it in silver?
>
> Mr. MILLARD. If we are to have a silver dollar worth only 79 cents, I say let us pay it in silver.
>
> Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Did anybody ever refuse to receive payment for silver bullion in silver?
>
> Mr. MILLARD. I do not think the Government ever offered silver for silver bullion.
> Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That is the trouble. If they would carry out the law faithfully they would.

I agree, sir, that now there is taken $2,000,000 per month in gold to buy silver bullion for coinage, but I call your attention to this fact, and I assert it boldly, that never since the passage of the Bland bill, down to the time that a Republican [Mr. Burchard] left the position of Director of the Mint last summer, was there a dollar of gold paid for silver bullion for coinage purposes?

Every dollar of silver bullion purchased by the Treasury for coinage purposes under Republican rule was paid for in standard dollars or silver certificates—every dollar!

It is reserved for a Democratic administration to inaugurate the new system of its own motion, and without the request of those having silver bullion to sell; a system of payment in gold where silver was all that was desired, and then, after thus adopting that plan, announce it as vicious, and as a reason why silver coinage should be suspended! That argument can easily be disposed of by returning to the former practice.

It is another example of the "tireless energy" of the administration in getting silver into circulation.

The practice of the administration is a fraud, a deceit, a sham.

These, sir, are only a few of the bitter, hostile actions of the Treasury against silver. I have deemed it important to emphasize them, that the country may know precisely how its will, as expressed in the law, is being treated, as the reason why I am impressed with the belief I have so frequently expressed and still entertain that no proposal in the interest of silver can be safely left to the discretion of the Treasury officials; that every proposal looking toward its proper recognition must be affirmed in an express provision of law.

I believe these hostile acts and expressions are the most important factors in the depreciation of silver in the market, and I believe the illegal and unwarranted discrimination against silver by these officials s intended to work its degradation and destruction.

The interests of the metal have, unfortunately, for the past twenty-five years been under the control of its enemies, whose interests and wishes have been opposed to it; and after it has been, by these adverse buffetings, crippled, maimed, debased, depreciated, and dishonored, so far as these men could make it so, they then mock its incapacity caused so largely by their acts and efforts; treat gold the same way and its condition would be as bad.

This debate will be profitable, if in no other way, in emphasizing these facts before the country. The conduct of the executive officers in the matter is utterly inexcusable; whether the policy shall ultimately prove to be good or bad, the people are for silver and are entitled to have the laws enacted by their representatives administered in the spirit in which they were passed. The enforcement by an administration in this nation of a policy against the will of the people has never yet been successful.

President Johnson tried it in the broad field of national politics. President Hayes did the same on this very question, in his veto of the act of 1878, of which it was said it is the first time in the whole history of the country that a veto message by the President of the United States has not only been absolutely impotent, but has actually increased the strength of the measure. For the first time the United States has a President thus shown to be powerless, not only with his own party, which he has displeased, but with the opposite party whose good-will he has not been able to obtain. President Cleveland may profit by their example!

I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to go into the arguments so exhaustively and conclusively made by the friends of silver, demonstrating so certainly the fallacies of the friends of suspension.

Experience, the best of teachers, shows that the 80-cent dollar goes quietly on its way, buying as much bread and clothing, furnishing as many of the comforts and luxuries of life, educating the children to the same extent, received in every avenue of trade and commerce as its more aristocratic brother, the gold dollar.

That instead of driving gold out of the country, we never in our history as a nation had so much; and it is still coming and will continue to come so long as the balance of trade is in our favor; and when that balance shall be against us, will some opponent of silver tell us how the condition would be bettered if silver was disused?

The balance then would have to be paid in gold or in low-priced commodities of our own production.

In such a condition of trade our domestic relations require an abundance of legal tender not affected by such a transfer of gold.

You will read in vain the speeches made on this subject for an answer to this question. If international balances are settled in gold how can it injure a debtor country to have a liberal allowance of silver coin a legal tender for domestic debts?

The position set up is absurd to me. I think I know that between nations all settlement of balances is the old system of barter. Our metals are taken not as dollars but as bullion, weighed as merchandise and valued in the mint of the receiving country, put in the melting-pot, the fineness corrected, if not in accord, and coined into the standard of the foreign country; and it makes no difference, none whatever, whether we have 25.8 grains of gold .9 fine in a dollar, or 20 grains and call that a dollar. They treat it as metal and by weight.

Mr. Speaker, in the rapid increase of population we are having, in the immense strides in improvement and material progress we are taking, we need more and more money year by year. Continuing and general prosperity can only be assured by a steadiness of general prices, which can only be maintained when the volume of money and amount of population increase in practically relative proportions. There never was, never will be, a time when general prosperity and a general fall in prices coexisted. The necessary increase in money in this country can not be had by gold coinage, for the world's annual production of that metal is diminishing; it must come from silver coinage—it can come in no other way; and because I am in favor of the restoration of silver to its old position, equality with gold, and am opposed, unalterably, to any discrimination either in law or practice against the "dollar of the fathers," I am in favor of the bill for the free, unlimited coinage of silver on the old basis. Nor do I fear an excess of silver. The annual production is diminishing, and without wearying the House or burdening the RECORD with tables, it is enough to say that when from the annual supply of the whole world you deduct enough for the arts and the varied manufactures of silver, and the requirements of the exclusively silver-using countries their needed supplies, there will not be enough left, if we obtained it all, to more than supply what we can profitably use in our country. And we need it, too, as the basis of the currency for the future in this country, namely: coin certificates, which shall be a legal tender for the payment of all debts, except when otherwise provided.

The national debt is being rapidly paid. This will extinguish the security of the national-bank notes, resulting in their ultimate retirement. Coin certificates should and will take their place.

It is no argument to me against this that a few miners would be benefited; that is an argument for it. I know the country where silver is mined. I have spent my whole life in the great West and have seen the operations of silver mining carried on. It is begun under the most adverse conditions and surroundings, and in the most uninviting aspect of nature; in barren, bleak, and inhospitable mountains and hillsides, remote from civilization and the ordinary comforts of life. From the hills and mountains of Colorado to the immense works and the wonderful shafts on the Comstock in Nevada I have seen the operations of extracting the precious metal by intricate processes of the most skillful character, from the rock in which it was deposited by nature—tedious, laborious, expensive operation, more often fruitless than successful, but persevered in when there was an alluring hope. As a result, I have seen that wild, forbidding section of the Union build up and improve; its valleys, small as they are, made the homes of thousands of happy, prosperous, and contented citizens, and here and there along the railroads which climb the mountain-sides are prosperous villages, towns, and cities, some of which rival in every way the more pretentious cities of the East—all resulting from the mining industry.

Sir, it does not cause any feeling of sadness in my mind that the passage of the bill will benefit that people. I am glad it may. They deserve it. Nor have I, Mr. Speaker, any apprehension as to policy or duty if the time shall come that equivalency of values, monetary and commercial, shall be insisted on, and necessary. I have no hesitancy in declaring that I shall vote and act to make the equivalency by taking the necessary grains out of the gold dollar, rather than by adding to the weight or value of the silver dollar. If that time shall come, the contest will be, as I believe it is here and now, between the debtor and the creditor classes.

Ring the changes in any way upon words; state it as you please; it all comes back to the one point—the rich and income classes struggling for advantage, the laborer and producer resisting the attempt.

But no fear need be entertained by the timid that the great public sentiment of the country will favor injustice to its creditor. The sense of public honor is high and the performance of its requirements may safely be intrusted to the heart of this people, and we as their representatives may be well content if we crystallize into statute and insist upon the performance, through proper legislation, of their deliberate judgment.

Mr. BARKSDALE obtained the floor.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] yields to me one minute. I wish to state that, being under the impression that the order of the House with reference to debate to-day on the silver bill was one which could not be set aside except by unanimous consent, I was for that reason a little late in getting to the House this morning, having some business of my constituents which detained me at the Departments. Hence I was not present to vote on the labor-arbitration bill. If I had been present, I should have voted for that bill.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, disguise it as the advocates of the suspension of silver coinage may, the intention is ultimately to extinguish it as a part of the monetary system of the country. The authors and abettors of the agitation are responsible for attempting a radical innovation upon the time-honored traditions of the country, and the destruction of a system which is coeval with the Government and has ever received the sanction of the people by whom and for whom it was created. I know that in deprecating and opposing this scheme I am reflecting the will of the constituency to whom I am directly responsible. I am conscious, moreover, that I am standing by the landmarks of the fathers; standing by the Constitution which they framed; standing by the example which they set for the guidance of those who were to come after them; and standing by the precedents and platform of the national Democratic party, of which I am a member.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], in his argument in favor of the suspension of silver coinage, objected to the dissent of Democratic Representatives from the recommendations of the President. He protested against their "criticisms." He seems to have forgotten that the legislative department is distinct from and independent of the executive department; that each has its appointed sphere; that each must be guided by its own convictions of duty, and that both are responsible to their common sovereign, the people. I arraign no one. I accord to the President the same integrity of purpose which I claim for myself and for the great majority of the Democratic membership of this House who are in favor of silver coinage; but I will not admit that we who are opposing the attempt to destroy it are lacking in fealty to the Democratic organization and its measures.

The platform of the national Democratic party declares for "honest money, consisting of gold and silver, and of paper convertible into coin;" and this declaration is almost a verbatim reproduction of the platform of the Democracy of Pennsylvania, the gentleman's [Mr. SCOTT'S] own State. On the 29th of April, 1880, the Democracy of that State, in convention assembled, adopted by acclamation a resolution, reported by another Representative of Pennsylvania on this floor [Mr. ERMENTROUT] declaring that the "Democratic party, as of old, is in favor of a constitutional currency of gold and silver." The gentleman [Mr. SCOTT] who now appears as a champion of silver suppression, and who arraigns the Democracy for dissenting from his attitude, was a member of that convention, and consented to the resolution.

During the long period which intervened between 1792, when the first coinage act was passed, and 1873, when silver was eliminated from the national currency, there was no thought of taking this departure. It was in the latter year, with a fatuity which has scarcely a parallel, that a scheme was covertly and with premeditation executed to strike down and degrade an essential part of the metallic money of the country—a money-metal which had served as a circulating medium of commerce from the remotest antiquity, and which is now being used as a medium of exchange and measure of values by the largest portion of the commercial world. Speaking of the maintenance of silver equally with gold as the metallic money of the country from 1792 up to 1873, Mr. Groesbeck, a distinguished delegate of the United States to the International Monetary Conference of 1878, said:

> It is enough to say that throughout the period I have referred to the two metals served us for all our transactions abroad quite as well as we would have been served if we had used but one. How was it at home? This is a far more interesting inquiry. Not a merchant or manufacturer or banker was injured or embarrassed or hindered in his business because we had made both metals a legal tender, and not a merchant, manufacturer, or banker would have prospered more if we had used gold or silver alone. Not a creditor or debtor uttered a complaint or sought a change; not a laborer, farmer, or mechanic was dissatisfied. Such was our experience in the equal use of both metals as money, and the nation was in a condition of absolute rest and acquiescence in its long-tried policy. In 1873 and 1874, I believe, without a single recommendation from the press, or from boards of trade, or chambers of commerce, or from any other direction, and when, for the first time, our public debt had become heavy and burdensome, and private indebtedness was larger than ever before, and we were in a state of suspension upon a currency amounting to more than seven hundred millions—in such an exigency, and with the knowledge that we were richer in mines of silver than any nation on the globe, we threw our silver away and set up gold alone.

This declaration has not been controverted, and can not be. It is strictly true. The people had not been consulted. They had not expressed their approbation of it through any channel by which their voice finds utterance. The step was taken as stealthily as the tread of a wolf into the sheepfold in the darkness of the night. In truth it did not originate, but found ready abettors, in this country. It originated with what has been styled the Bondholding Directory of Europe; and its object was to increase the burden of indebtedness in both hemispheres. The scheme has been well described as "a combination of usurers so to contract the currency as to double their profits and double the burden of debts upon the shoulders of the toiling people."

> According to my view of the subject—

Said the distinguished gentleman [Mr. CARLISLE] who now presides over this body, pending the discussion of the silver coinage bill in 1878—

> the conspiracy which seems to have been formed here and in Europe to destroy from three-sevenths to one-half of the metallic money of the world was the most gigantic crime of this or any other age.

With gold as the only metallic money debts would be practically doubled and the value of products and earnings of labor would be correspondingly reduced. The fortunate capitalist would grow richer, and the unfortunate debtor and toiling producer would become poorer. A decline of prices follows a reduction of the currency, as night the day.

The contractionists, in their lust of gain, seemed to have set this plain rule of economy at defiance and conspired to contract the currency at the very moment when the increased business and population of the country demanded its enlargement.

They acted, too, in disregard of the calamitous effects of the same policy in the countries whose bad example we have been urged to follow. A learned economist, Professor W. S. Jevons, gives the following graphic description of the effect of silver demonetization in the European countries:

> There is no doubt that prices, profits, and wages are falling in many industries which have hitherto been prosperous. The first cause in importance, the most general, and in all probability the most enduring, is the rapid rise in the economical value of gold. While the area of civilization is widening, and therefore the demand for an adequate currency is being extended, the most populous state of Europe has abandoned a silver for a gold currency, and has had as a fruit of its successful war with France an exceptional power for attracting gold to itself, with singular success indeed, but to the incredible misfortune of its people. Germany has effected a monetary revolution on the grandest scale, and has beggared its own industries.

But here is still higher authority. I will quote from the report of the American commission to the International Monetary Conference of 1878—Messrs. R. E. Fenton, W. S. Groesbeck, and Francis A. Walker:

The effect of the German demonetization and of the closing of the mints of the Latin Union to silver has been to destroy the par of exchange between Europe and Asia; to introduce into the commercial dealings of two of the great divisions of the world a degree of uncertainty making trade highly speculative, the fluctuations in the price of silver often far exceeding the usual rates of business profit. The intercourse between gold countries and silver countries has thus been subjected to difficulties precisely the same in kind as those which beset the intercourse of specie-paying nations with those suffering from an irredeemable paper circulation. These difficulties, it is manifest, must be perpetuated in time and aggravated in degree should the movement for the rejection of silver continue. We have here the explanation of the change in the attitude of England since 1867, and of the willingness of the delegation of that country in 1878 to assist, so far as could be done without compromising the position of England as a gold-using State, in promoting the use of silver equally with that of gold.

Mr. Goschen, the learned representative of Her Brittanic Majesty in the same Conference, though not acceding to the proposition of the American commissioners, had the frankness and candor to admit that "it would be a great misfortune if a propaganda against silver should succeed;" and he protested against the theory that silver should be excluded from the monetary system of the world.

It is evident that the public mind of England is rapidly turning to bimetallism; and the signs indicate that public opinion will force the Government to re-establish it. A recent meeting of the Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom, at London, adopted the following resolution by an overwhelming majority:

The present tendency of silver toward disuse as money is disturbing trade generally and England's Eastern commerce in particular. Therefore we urge the government to unite with other countries in an endeavor to restore silver to its former function as a legal tender, thereby giving it a permanent instead of a fluctuating value.

The reaction in Germany is evidenced by the growing demand for bimetallism. The agricultural classes are holding meetings and are protesting against the single gold standard. The following resolutions adopted recently by the general committee of the congress of German farmers speak in no doubtful language:

The congress of German farmers has repeatedly recommended at its general meetings with regard to the monetary question, and has urged in the interest of German agriculture the adoption by treaty of an international double standard. In the course of the past year the condition of German agriculture has unhappily become so much worse that the committee believes it is necessary to urge your illustrious body in this most emphatic matter to afford the swiftest and most decided assistance possible to the sorely tried agricultural interest of Germany. As we consider that a restoration of its value to silver by means of international bimetallism is the surest and most thorough possible, the committee has advised the farmers' and peasants' unions of Germany to unite in general petition against the single gold standard.

The committee of the congress of the German farmers has the honor to lay before your illustrious body herewith a first installment of such petitions received up to this time by the bureau of the congress, and to ask your attention to them. The distress of the German farmers is known to the imperial government, and we thankfully acknowledge the help which has been promised us. Unhappily, the measures adopted so far, and particularly the increase of the corn duties, can not afford the necessary aid; on the contrary, the condition of the landed interest has become so deplorable that unless help is shortly afforded, a general catastrophe is inevitable. The greater the necessity the more difficult becomes the alleviation. The fear now is widespread that special legislation is imperative to rescue the landed interest of Germany from destruction. In these circumstances we expect help and support from your illustrious body, and we believe it can be given in no such practical and effectual manner as by an effort on the part of your illustrious body to bring about international bimetallism. And we must here protest against the imputation that has been cast upon the German land interest of wishing, by means of bimetallism, to deal unfairly with creditors. We are protecting ourselves against dear money. We demand for silver only a restitution to its old historic relations, and we see in this no injustice to creditors, certainly no injustice greater than the injustice done to debtors by the demonetization of silver. The rise of the gold value in all countries using silver and paper standards not only checks the exports resulting from German industries, but it has also created a competition with our German agriculture on the part of those countries which are the largest agricultural producers against which customs duties are inadequate protection, because gold rises rapidly in those countries to a point beyond the amount of the duties, and thereby practically annuls the defensive value of those duties.

We express no opinion as to whether the adoption of bimetallism without the support of England may or may not be disadvantageous to some branches of the wholesale and export trade of Germany. What we do say is that the existence of the industry and the land interest of Germany is of greater importance than some hypothetical disadvantage to our foreign commerce and to our banking and exchange classes.

Even as regards those, it does not seem to us charitable to wait much upon the action of England. Our actual necessities afford much stronger reason for a speedy understanding between the German Empire and such other states as have long been ready to adopt this course and to effect general bimetallism.

May your illustrious body hear this cry of distress of the German farmers, and give effect to our petition.

I have said that the act ostracising silver and divesting it of its legal-tender property was an imitation of the example of the plutocratic countries of the Old World; that the step was taken surreptitiously and not in the bold and manly fashion which evinces consciousness of right.

Hidden away in the body of a bill the title of which concealed the serpent that was wrapped in its folds was the following clause:

No coins either of gold, silver, or minor coinage shall hereafter be issued from the Mint other than those of the denomination, standard, and weight herein set forth.

The coins here excepted were the trade-dollar, which did not possess the legal-tender functions, and fractional currency. This act served to expel silver from the mints.

In the Revised Statutes which were reported to Congress the next year the following clause occurs:

The silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all sums not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

This act divested silver of its legal-tender property and reduced it to the condition of the baser metals.

A distinguished Senator, who was at that time a member of the House, and was noted for his vigilance and ability, has frankly declared that he was not aware of the enactment of these clauses; and that there were not ten members of the House of Representatives who knew of the existence of these provisions demonetizing silver. Even the President who signed the act of 1873 was not informed until months afterward that it contained the fatal clause.

In a letter dated October 3, 1873, to Mr. Cowdry, General Grant said:

I wonder that silver is not already coming into the market to supply the deficiency in the circulating medium. * * * Experience has proved that it takes about $40,000,000 of fractional currency to make the small change necessary for the transaction of the business of the country. Silver will gradually take the place of this currency, and, further, will become the standard of values, which will be hoarded in a small way. I estimate that this will consume from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 in time of this species of our circulating medium. * * * I confess to a desire to see a limited hoarding of money. But I want to see a hoarding of something that is a standard of value the world over. Silver is this.

* * * * * * *

Our mines are now producing almost unlimited amounts of silver, and it is becoming a question, "What shall we do with it?" I suggest here a solution which will answer for some years to put it in circulation, keeping it there until it is fixed, and then we will find other markets.

This letter proves that months after General Grant had signed the bill which purported only to correct irregularities in the coinage laws, he was ignorant of the fact that it had ostracized the standard silver dollar from the mints. With natural impatience, he inquired where is this favorite money of the people? Why does it not come forth to supply the need of a circulating medium? And echo answered, why!

There was amazement in the land when the people came to a knowledge of the fraud that had been practiced. But "truth is omnipotent and public justice certain." In 1878, after a protracted and able discussion, a bill was passed over the veto of the President authorizing the limited coinage of silver and reinvesting it with its legal-tender functions. Its friends did not accept it as a full measure of justice. They passed it under protest as the best they could do under the circumstances but with the understanding that they would renew and continue the struggle until silver was placed on an equal footing with gold.

To show the predominating sentiment of the advocates of silver coinage at that day, I will adduce the following extracts from the debates:

Mr. Cox, of New York, said:

I stand upon the principle that gold and silver shall walk hand in hand in their financial function, and it is but just and fair to both of them that they should have equal chances; otherwise the results expected may fail. But I have not time to discuss that, except to say that although this bill does not come up to the standard which I have marked out, I will stand upon the old equitable principle that if you can not get the very best thing then take the best you can get. It is the doctrine cy pres. I believe this measure, even as amended, is the best we can now get. Under and subject to the Constitution we have the right to amend all our laws. Are not all our enactments revocable, and may they not be supplemented? I trust that if necessary in the future fresh legislation may cure any defect that may be discovered in the measure about to pass the House.—Congressional Record, volume 28, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 1268.

Mr. BLACKBURN, of Kentucky, said:

It bears upon its face evidence that the moneyed power has in the passage of this measure been beaten but not broken. But the measure even as it stands is not to be accounted valueless. It does restore silver to the coinage. It does make it a legal tender for all debts, public and private, without limit. It does give us a bimetallic instead of a single standard. Ay, sir; it does more. It opens up the way for other and further legislation in this direction, which should, and I doubt not will, speedily follow.—Congressional Record, volume 31, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 41.

Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky, and Speaker of the present House, said:

Our power of legislation over this subject will not be exhausted by the passage of this measure, and we ought not to halt for a single moment in our efforts to complete the work of relief inaugurated by it. The struggle now going on can not cease and ought not to cease until the industrial interests of the country are fully and finally emancipated from the heartless domination of syndicates, stock exchanges, and other great combinations of money-grabbers in this country and in Europe. Let us, if we can do no better, pass bill after bill, embracing in each some one substantial provision of relief, and send them to the Executive for his approval. If he withholds his signature and we are unable to secure the necessary vote here or elsewhere to enact them into laws notwithstanding his veto, let us, as a last resort, suspend the rules and put them into the general appropriation bills, with the distinct understanding that if the people can get no relief the Government can get no money.—Congressional Record and Appendix, volume 31, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 44.

Mr. BLAND, of Missouri, said:

I do not like this bill. It is not what the country expects. But I am in favor of taking this now as making one step in the right direction. But I give notice here, and now that this war shall never cease so long as I have a voice in this Congress until the rights of the people are fully restored, and the silver dollar shall take its place alongside the gold dollar.—Congressional Record, volume 28, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 1250.

Strange as it may seem, the Bondholding Directory are not content to permit the existing status of silver to remain, unjust though it be to the people, and far below the position in which it was placed by the
